

American Apartheid: Why Scandinavian Prisons Are Superior

"Open" prisons, in which detainees are allowed to live like regular citizens, should be a model for the U.S.

by Doran Larson

IT'S A POSTCARD-PERFECT DAY ON SUOMEN-linna Island, in Helsinki's South Harbor. Warm for the first week of June, day trippers mix with Russian, Dutch and Chinese tourists sporting sun shades and carrying cones of pink ice cream.

"Is this the prison?" asks a 40-something American woman wearing cargo pants and a floral sleeveless blouse.

Linda, my guide and translator, pauses beside me between the posts of an open picket fence. After six years of teaching as a volunteer inside American prisons, I've come from the private college where I work to investigate the Scandinavian reputation for humane prisons. It's the end of my twelfth prison tour, and I consider the semantics of the question: If you can't tell whether you're in a prison, can it be a prison? I've never considered this in so many words. Yet I find that I know the answer, having felt it inside a prison cell in Denmark: There is no punishment so effective as punishment that nowhere announces the intention to punish. Linda is an intern working on a degree in public policy. Young and thoroughly practical, she smiles and says to the tourists, "Yes, you are here."

The Americans look shocked and afraid. The father glances at his wife. The wife cocks her head back, as though she's ventured too far. The son – fit as my La Crosse-playing students – takes a step in reverse, just outside the gate, and says to his mother: "I told you." (Linda clearly wonders what she's said to cause such a reaction).

Then the son adds, his voice cracking on a nervous attempt at sarcasm: "It's sure reassuring to know we're being protected from criminals."

The Americans gather into a family huddle. Their whispers grow hot. The son grabs the top of his head – unable to believe this conversation is even taking place. Their response speaks to a particularly American reaction to prisons, and there's nothing unusual in it. But we'll leave them here to fill in the background needed to understand their dilemma.

SUOMENLINNA ISLAND HAS HOSTED AN "open" prison since 1971. The 95 male prisoners leave the prison grounds each day to do the township's general maintenance or commute to the mainland for work or study. Serving time for theft, drug trafficking, assault or murder, all the men here are on the verge of release. Cellblocks look like dorms at a state university. Though worse for wear, rooms feature flat-screen TVs, sound systems and mini-refrigerators for the prisoners who can afford to rent them for prison-labor wages of 4.10 to 7.3 Euros per hour ($5.30 to $9.50). With electronic monitoring, prisoners are allowed to spend time with their families in Helsinki. Men here enjoy a screened barbecue pit, a gym and a dining hall where prisoners and staff eat together. Prisoners throughout Scandinavia wear their own clothes. Officers wear navy slacks, powder-blue shirts, nametags and shoulder bars; but they carry no batons, handcuffs, Tasers or pepper-spray. The assistant warden who has led Linda and me around, Timo, looks like a wizened roadie: graying beard, black vest and jeans, red shirt, biker boots and a taste for slim cigars.

One might wonder just where is the "prison" part of this Scandinavian open prison. Where are the impenetrable barriers? The punishing conditions that satisfy an American sense of justice?

First, an important caveat: Nordic prisons are not all open facilities. Closed prisons here date to the mid-19th century, copied from Philadelphia's Eastern State, or New York's Auburn, back when those prisons represented models of humane treatment. To an American eye, these prisons look like prisons: 10-meter walls, cameras, steel doors. I've heard men describe Scandinavian closed-prison conditions in ways that echo those of the American prison where I have led a writing

Yet inside the four high-security prisons I've visited in Denmark, Norway, Sweden and Finland, common areas included table tennis, pool tables, steel darts and aquariums. Prisoner art-ornamented walls painted in mild greens and browns and blues. But the most profound difference is that correctional officers fill both rehabilitative and security roles. Each prisoner has a "contact officer" who monitors and helps advance progress toward return to the world outside – a practice introduced to help officers avoid the damage experienced by performing purely punitive functions: stress, hypertension, alcoholism, suicide and other job-related hazards that today plague American corrections officers, who have an average life expectancy of 59.

This is all possible because, throughout Scandinavia, criminal justice policy rarely enters political debate. Decisions about best practices are left to professionals in the field, who are often published criminologists and consult closely with academics. Sustaining the barrier between populist politics and results-based prison policy are media that don't sensationalize crime – if they report it at all. And all of this takes place in nations with established histories of consensual politics, relatively small and homogenous populations, and the best social service networks in the world, including the best public education.

Standing outside a Nordic closed prison, the American son would have felt perfectly at ease. But inside, northern Europe's closed facilities operate along the lines of humanism that American prisons abandoned early on, under a host of pressures – such as overcrowding, the push to make prisons profitable by contracting out collective labor, the use of unpaid prisoners as private farmhands and, since 1973, the rise of an $80 billion mass incarceration industry. There is also the matter of scale. The prison population of Sweden (6,900) is less than half the population of New York's Rikers Island jail at its height (14,000). Several prisons in the U.S. each hold nearly twice the prison population of Finland. This is not simply the difference between large and much smaller countries. U.S. incarceration rates are the highest in the world, about 10 times those throughout Scandinavia, which are among the world's lowest.

There's certainly a tipping point at which smaller numbers of prisoners allow for a different quality of prison practice. But the issue here is the instinctive, visceral fear of prisons and prisoners. It is about basic assumptions regarding what states must do to people who violate the law, not only in order to secure the safety, but to satisfy the sense of justice, of law-abiding citizens. Even if the U.S. prison population dropped by 90 percent overnight, it's not clear that U.S. prison officials, under the eye of the public and politicians, would either know how or be allowed to handle the remaining prisoners differently. And this is at a time when even tough-on-crime politicians acknowledge that states are going broke supporting prisons with no positive return to taxpayers – including no net boost to public safety. So this is both a philosophical quandary and a practical question: How is it that Nordic prisons that seem so cushy yield recidivism rates one-half to one-third of those in the U.S. (20-30 percent versus 40-70 percent)? And why can't the U.S. reduce prison populations not simply through drug courts and very tepid sentencing reforms but by creating more transformative prisons? The answers emerge from the history that stands behind those American tourists' nervousness.

Twenty years of social science research has drawn a consistently clear portrait of the rise of America's unprecedented regime of mass incarceration: Over the past four decades, Republicans and Democrats have waged a "tougher on crime than you" arms race built upon white unease with the disruption of the old racial order brought about by the civil rights and Black Power movements. Once segregation was declared unconstitutional and black activists began to demand equal rights, white fear called out for "law and order." Seeking votes and profits, politicians and media have encouraged the white public's worst fears of becoming the victims of black perpetrators. Under the guise of the wars on drugs, crime and now terror, the urban poor and disenfranchised, especially young black men, have been rounded up in mass numbers, largely for non-violent drug crimes, of which middle-class whites have been consistently shown to be equal perpetrators.

vision shows like Law & Order and The Wire present black criminals as overrepresented by unscrupulous defense lawyers – defending the “punks” that George Zimmerman believed “always get away with it.” And these trends have continued even though crime rates have been dropping since the early 90s, while only one in 40 criminal cases goes to jury trial and prosecutors bargain pleas by threatening suspects with the longest prison sentences in the industrialized world.

Decades of research show that incarceration and crime rates in the U.S. bear no fixed relationship. Between 1999 and 2009, for example, New York shrank its prison population by 20 percent while crime rates dropped by 29 percent; from 2000 to 2010, Indiana increased its prison population by 45 percent and reduced its crime rate by .08 percent. In the 1950s, Finland made the decision to lower its incarceration rates in line with Scandinavian norms; it shrank that rate by 75 percent across periods of both rising and stable crime. Prison size is not determined by crime rates but by what states decide to treat as crimes, how much punishment the public demands and, in the U.S. today, how successful the prison industry is in fomenting that demand. And all of these factors are determined by whom voters imagine this punishment landing upon.

This peculiarly American institutionalization has created a nation where few middle-class white Americans can name anyone they know personally who has been sentenced to prison, and even fewer black Americans of any class cannot.

In 1993, Norwegian criminologist Nils Christie (a major influence on Scandinavian penal policy) had already unpacked this phenomenon. In Crime Control as Industry, Christie concluded that the more unlike oneself the imagined perpetrator of crime, the harsher the conditions one will agree to impose upon convicted criminals, and the greater the range of acts one will agree should be designated as crimes. More homogeneous nations institutionalize mercy, which is to say they attend more closely to the circumstances surrounding individual criminal acts. The opposite tendency, expressed in mandatory sentencing and indiscriminate “three strikes” laws, not only results from but widens social distance. The harshness of the punishment that fearful voters are convinced is the only thing that works on people who don’t think or act like them becomes a measure of the moral distance between those voters and people identified as criminals.

Author Kenneth E. Hartman has lived inside California prisons for over three decades. In an essay in the forthcoming book, Fourth City: Essays from the Prison in America, he speaks to why that system sees 75 percent of all repeat parolees back within three years:

“Most prisoners are uneducated, riddled with unresolved traumas and ill-treated mental health problems, drug and alcohol addictions, and self-esteem issues far too often bordering on the pathological. The vast majority has never received competent health care, mental health care, drug treatment, education or even an opportunity to look at themselves as humans. Had any of these far less draconian interventions been tried ... no doubt many of my peers would be leading productive lives. We internalize the separation and removal, the assumed less-than status, and hold up the idiotic and vainglorious pride we pretend to, like clown’s make-up, to hide our shame. In the end, the vast majority of us become exactly who we are told we are: violent, irrational and incapable of conducting ourselves like conscious adults. It is a tragic opera with an obvious outcome. Nothing else works is not a statement of fact; it is the declaration of an ideology. This ideology holds that punishment, for the sake of the infliction of pain, is the logical response to all misbehavior. It is also a convenient cover story behind which powerful special interest groups hide.”

Though white, Hartman echoes the observations of the same Black Power prison writers of the 1960s and ‘70s, whose insights helped inspire white backlash:

Convicted criminals bring to prison issues that devolve directly from poverty and poverty's traumatic fallout: broken and abusive homes, communities and schools; mental illness, alcoholism and addiction. Rather than remediating the effects of these issues, prisons tend to institutionalize them.

Those of us in the virtually prison-immune demographics also fail to credit convicted people with the simple capacity to see and understand where they are. No imprisoned American has to be told she has been left to the whims of under-screened and under-trained staff, most of whom are also from impoverished circumstances. They see staff rewarded with promotion for harsh treatment of prisoners and on the way to solid pensions. They know that it doesn't matter what potential for shame, for self-castigation, penitence or desire to make amends resides inside any American prisoner. Parole decisions are made by political appointees who watch the backs of their patrons. The system itself breeds cynical resentment. Witnessing the humiliation, racism and physical assault perpetrated against prisoners – by staff, or tolerated among prisoners – can overfill the psychological space where reflection and self-searching might occur.

Now imagine yourself in a prison that commands a view from a tourist brochure. Your cell phone lies on a shelf, next to a TV and CD player, inside a prison that lets you go to paid work or study. There is no perimeter wall. Prison staff will help you with free-world social services to cover a missed month's rent on your family's apartment. Another will help you look for work, or for the next stage of education. Imagine yourself a prisoner who knows he is in prison for what he did, not because of his color or class, or because, lacking the resources for a proper defense, he plea-bargained under threat of near-geological years of incarceration.

But also imagine living on this lovely island knowing, every minute of every day, that this is not your home, these people are not your family, your friends, your children, and you are always one misstep from a cell in a closed prison. You have strict curfews. In town you wear an electronic anklet. Yet nothing here feels unfair or unreasonable. You have, after all, committed a crime serious enough to make a range of other remedies untenable. Nothing you can see or touch or smell or taste, and no interaction with staff, gives you anything to blame or resent about the system that brought you here.

This is the polished glass nightmare. Every emotional discomfort, every moment of remorse that you might try to cover with resentment of the system, everything you try to grip onto to crawl away from personal responsibility slides back into the pit of the self. Judges and prosecutors are unelected professionals who are under political pressure only to minimize prison populations. The message everywhere you look and walk is the same: You did this to yourself. You sit in a university classroom, but you harbor a secret. You are not like the others. On the way to work, you walk along a lovely sea wall, among kids and adults on holiday, but you know you are not free. You look like them; they never raise an eyebrow at you. But you know. You are under quarantine, and the disease is the past you made for yourself.

Everything is being done to help and prepare you to clear this secret and live again like others. But the weight, finally, rests with you. This truly existential weight is implicit in the principle of normality, which is practiced throughout Scandinavian prisons: "The punishment is the restriction of liberty; no other rights have been removed," reads a fact sheet on criminal services in Norway. "During the serving of a sentence, life inside will resemble life outside as much as possible. You need a reason to deny a sentenced offender his rights, not to grant them. Progression through a sentence should be aimed as much as possible at returning to the community. The more closed a system is, the harder it will be to return to freedom."

One has to wonder if 10 years in such a glass funnel, directing all shame, anger and recrimination back onto oneself, is not a morally harsher sentence than twice that time inside a 24-hour war zone where some of the most powerful warriors wear state uniforms, where family visits are made into scenes of collective humiliation and where the few rehabilitative programs are run either by other prisoners or by unionized staff who suffer even less scrutiny than guards.

Inside U.S. prisons, decades can be filled with the labor of simple survival. Reflection upon the decisions that brought anyone to confinement must overcome the bitterness evoked by a system that sustains such an environment.

I MET ERIK IN A DANISH OPEN PRISON where he was finishing a 10-year sentence for a drug-related murder. He began addiction treatment and work toward his public-school diploma while awaiting the appeal of his case. He continued his studies while serving two years in a closed prison. The open prison of Søbysøgård occupies an old manor farm amid rolling hills laced with suburban streets and alcoves. Buildings erected in the 17th century house administrative offices and classrooms with carved moldings, fireplaces and towering windows. There is no perimeter wall and no fences. Prisoners work in a small dairy, or in three greenhouses raising organic herbs, zucchini and cucumbers. Having done well in school (his English is excellent), Erik is allowed to study full-time for his university degree.

He wants to earn a master's, "To give me a better chance of getting a job, with a prison record." (His record will be cleared after five years if he works in the private sector; after ten years if he works in the public sector).

Erik's room is about 8 by 12 feet, with a TV, computer (to facilitate on-line study on strictly limited sites), sound system and a cell phone he can use to call home or get calls at any time. When I visited, he stressed the importance of the phone for keeping in contact with family, to sustain emotional ties, as well as "to vent and to heal." One wall is covered with pictures of himself as a younger man with his girlfriend. The housing unit has a clean, bright communal kitchen. Men cook together in order to save money. A bus takes them to a grocery where local citizens wait outside while the men shop.

Edvin, the director of education, is a tall man who dresses like a farmer and sits by quietly while I speak with Erik and two other men, who together represent the racial demographics in Scandinavian prisons as a whole: two are white natives and the third is a foreign-born man of color. In Edvin's presence they are openly critical of the life inside closed prisons. All express thanks that they are not in one, let alone in the American prisons they have seen on TV. On the last walk from the dairy down the gravel driveway, I learn why they trust Edwin. He's concerned about plans to build a closed prison adjacent to Søbysøgård. At the end of the drive, he stops and faces me.

"I worry that we will ruin the spirit of Søbysøgård."

He's described that spirit throughout our tour: sober work and study, supportive community and active reintegration into life outside. An officer that I spoke to expressed a similar sentiment. He'd served in a closed prison, and did not want to go back.

But it was inside Erik's cell that dread lifted my neck hairs at the thought of serving time in such a place. A breeze touched the leaves of the maple tree outside his window. Then it curled the corners of the pictures tacked and taped to the wall: Erik in a tux beside his silver-tiara-ed girl; he and friends on a beach with his dog, a dopey-looking setter. Prisoners develop a sixth sense for the moods of others. It's a required skill for anyone who has lived with people who suffer emotional and mental disorders that can turn violent. He sensed that something was up. I looked at him.

"I did this to myself," he said.

I did not know what to say. I said, "I'm sorry."

"Not as sorry as I am."

JEREMY HAS BEEN IN MY MAXIMUM-security writing workshop for three years. He's serving 22 years to life. He has difficulty getting to the class due to conflicts with religious practice and guards who seem to enjoy picking on him because he's Puerto Rican, Muslim, physically slight (about 5'5" and 140 pounds), and a law-library clerk (thus standing just above child molesters among guards' favorite targets). His major project has been a long essay about his crime. He was raised by an abusive stepfather who once held a gun to his head and threatened to kill him. On the street, he was harassed by a neighborhood bully. The bully was strong and tough but, unlike Jeremy, unpopular with girls. The bully once broke Jeremy's arm so badly that a steel plate now holds it together. Without a place of retreat either inside or outside his home, Jeremy decided to kill himself. He took his father's gun. He was high, but needed to get higher to work up his courage, when he ran into the bully outside a liquor store and shot him. Jeremy was 17.

He's mindful of actions he might have taken: moving in with his sister, seeking outside help, even getting control of his popularity with girls. With a merely competent lawyer his story might have played well with a jury, but he had no money for a real defense. He didn't deny that he'd killed. He took a plea bargain from a DA who threatened what prisoners call a "lights out" stretch of years, used to scare suspects into saving the state the time and costs of a jury trial.

I have listened to men complain about their cases, their do-nothing lawyers, about racism. Jeremy does not complain. He's a self-effacing young man. But I wonder what he'll be by his first parole hearing at age 40. He can feel no more profound regret than he does already for the family of the young man he killed. He can feel no deeper remorse for his actions. Yet for another 18 years he will endure counselors (many of them former guards) who do little more than keep prisoner files in order. He will continue the daily work of self-protection from men in need of mental health and addiction care. He'll continue to do white-collar work for wages that can be counted in dimes and pennies. He'll talk with his sister from a phone in the yard, impatient men waiting behind him, at sky-high rates charged only to prisoners. And for 18 years he'll negotiate the moods of correctional officers who find in him enjoyable sport. Jeremy is no longer the scared kid who pulled a trigger. He has said, in many ways, "I did this to myself." But by the time he leaves he may be too far removed from that kid, across decades among violently desperate men and staff whose simplistic refrain stretches nationwide: "If you can't do the time, you shouldn't have done the crime."

If Jeremy seems too much the poster child for more merciful prisons, consider Jake: white and sent by his mother's hard work to private schools, Jake became enamored of the mystique around organized crime. He killed his crime partner, as he admits now, in large part to complete his street cred as a gangster. Jake, too, takes the full weight for his crime. He was young and stupid. He believed that the man he killed had already gotten away with murder. This was all part of a self-credentialing plan. He went to trial with a legendary defense lawyer, and lost. He carries the lights-out years that Jeremy bargained out of. And every night that we sit discussing his essays about his crime, his regrets or his research into theories of criminal deterrence, I can see and hear him continue an internal wrestling match. The self-loathing that wells up from thinking about the destructive arrogance of his crime grapples with resentment at the destructive stupidity of the prison system.

I've heard older men describe how they came in cocky, then grew into shame and remorse. Yet their regret is regularly overshadowed by anger against the arbitrary overshadowed by anger against the arbitrary suffering that the prison perpetrates. These older, wiser men, like Kenneth Hartman, know this is the toughest challenge inside. The chaos of the life that put them in prison eventually evolves into the self-understanding that comes with age and assuming the weight of their crimes. But then begins the daily labor of denying the prison its power to turn them into the animals it sees in condemned people. As Rutgers University professor of education Benjamin Justice and Yale Law School professor Tracey Meares observe, the overt curriculum of the system is about fairness, due process and protection of law-abiding citizens. But for the objects of policing and punishment, "the American criminal justice system offers ... race- and class-based lessons on who is a citizen deserving of fairness and justice and who constitutes a group of dangerous others deserving of severe punishment, monitoring and virtual branding."

For a forthcoming book and digital archive, over the past four years I have been soliciting, reading and editing non-fiction essays by incarcerated Americans writing about their experience inside – essays from over half the states by black, white, Latina/o, Native American, and Asian and Pacific Island prisoners; by men, women and gender-variant prisoners; by first-timers and by people who were first locked up when Lyndon Johnson was president. Though many praise individuals who have helped them inside, not one essay among several hundred expresses the belief that the system exists at its current scale for any other reason than the tax-funded profits and jobs it provides.

Beatings and purely arbitrary punishment are the norm. Health care is poor when it is not dangerous. In many facilities, programs for addicts and alcoholics (who make up 85 percent of those convicted of violent crimes) are so inadequate that the names on waiting lists today will wait decades for help. And no matter the race of the writer, the racism within the system is assumed if not explicitly criticized. What political prisoner, reformer and eventual California prison administrator Kate Richards O'Hare wrote in her book In Prison in 1923 remains true today: "... by the workings of the prison system society commits every crime against the criminal that the criminal is charged with committing against society."

Scandinavian prisons are roughly as racially and ethnically homogeneous as American prisons: 70 percent of Nordic prisoners are ethnically white citizens; the other 30 percent are foreign-born (mostly from other EU countries). In U.S. prisons, ethnic and racial minorities make up over 60 percent of the population. The difference is that the majority of Scandinavian prisoners look like the majority – including the voting majority – outside. Laws, enforcement policies and prison practices are those that the majority of citizens assume would work for themselves. Whatever other differences may exist between law-abiding people and those convicted of crimes, the prison system itself does not seek to widen the social distance between them.

Though anti-immigrant racism has been on the rise in Europe for years, when its most egregious incident occurred in Norway – the massacre of 69 citizens, including many children – the nation's response was a deeper embrace of tolerance. (Roses became the symbol of this tolerance. Import tariffs on roses were dropped so that all Norwegians could contribute to spontaneous memorials). In this rare case, the killer will likely never see the free world again. But his suffering is and will continue to be his own.

In 1832, Alexis de Tocqueville and Gustave de Beaumont came to America to study its prisons. They concluded their report with a warning: "... guard against extremes, and do not let the zeal with which you advocate certain means obscure the object sought to be obtained by them."

Sweden's Shrinking Prison Population

by Christopher Zoukis

SWEDEN'S PRISON POPULATION HAS seen such a sharp drop in recent years that the nation's prison service announced in November 2013 that it had closed four correctional facilities and a remand center.

Prisons in Aby, Haja, Batshagen and Kristianstad were closed in 2013; two will likely be sold and the others transferred to other government agencies for temporary use. "We have seen an out-of-the-ordinary decline in the number of inmates," said Nils Oberg, head of Sweden's prison and probation services. "Now we have the opportunity to close down a part of our infrastructure that we don't need at this point in time."

Sweden's prison population has been dropping by around one percent per year since 2004, but declined six percent between 2011 and 2012. Oberg stated that he expects to see another six percent drop during 2013 and in 2014.

He said no one knows for sure why Sweden's prison population has dropped so sharply. "We certainly hope that the efforts we invest in rehabilitation and preventing relapse of crime has had an impact, but we don't think this could explain the entire drop of six percent."

One contributing factor may be related to a 2011 decision by the Swedish Supreme Court that resulted in more lenient sentences for drug offenders. There were about 200 fewer people serving prison terms for drug crimes as of March 2013 than a year before.

Hans von Hofer, a criminology professor at Stockholm University, believes that a recent shift in sentencing policy is a significant factor. Sweden has replaced short prison sentences with probationary sanctions for many minor offenses such as thefts and drug crimes. Of the fall in Sweden's prison population between 2004 and 2013, 36 percent was related to theft, 25 percent to drug offenses and 12 percent to violent crime.

The nation's prison population has decreased by nearly a sixth since peaking in 2004 at 5,722. In 2012, 4,852 people were imprisoned in Sweden, which has a population of 9.5 million – a rate of 51 per 100,000 citizens.

Sweden ranks 112th in the world for prison populations. The United States is the leader, with a prison and jail population of approximately 2.2 million – an incarceration rate of 716 per 100,000. China, whose human rights record is often decried by U.S. politicians, ranks second with 1.64 million people behind bars – but its rate is only 121 per 100,000 population.

In an opinion piece in the DN newspaper, prison chief Oberg said Sweden should work even harder on rehabilitating prisoners and needs to do more to help them once they return to society. Released prisoners on probation can receive treatment for substance abuse addictions and issues related to violence, and around 4,500 volunteers provide mentoring and support for former offenders.

"This year and next year the priority of our work will be with young offenders and men with convictions of violent behavior," said Kenneth Gustafsson, the governor of Sweden's Kumla prison. "For many years we have been running programs to help those addicted to drugs. Now we are also developing programs to address behaviors such as aggression and violence. These are the important things for our society when these people are released."

"In Sweden we believe very much in the concept of rehabilitation, without being naive of course," he added. "There are some people who will not or cannot change. But in my experience the majority of prisoners want to change and we must do what we can to help to facilitate that. It is not always possible to achieve this in one prison sentence. Also it is not just prison that can rehabilitate – it is often a combined process involving probation and greater society. We can give education and training, but when they leave prison these people need housing and jobs."

WELCOME TO THE FIRST ISSUE OF PLN for 2014. If you have not donated to our annual fundraiser, please do so now; it is not too late and we need your support to continue our advocacy work on issues like the Campaign for Prison Phone Justice, for which we do not get foundation funding.

Former political prisoner Nelson Mandela, who spent 27 years behind bars for seeking to overthrow the racist apartheid regime in South Africa, died on December 5, 2013 and has been eulogized extensively. Ironically, many of those now singing his praises were less than helpful when he was incarcerated on Robben Island. President Obama attended Mandela's funeral, yet for decades the U.S. supported the South African apartheid government. And, of course, the CIA was instrumental in helping the South African secret police – the Bureau of State Security (BOSS) – capture Mandela in the first place. Amnesty International mourned his death, yet Amnesty never recognized Mandela as a prisoner of conscience during his 27 years of captivity because he supported armed struggle against apartheid.

In ending apartheid in 1993, the South African ruling class gave up a little but kept a lot. Although apartheid was dismantled, the lives of the poorest South Africans did not change much. As an article in this issue of PLN by former U.S. political prisoner James Kilgore notes, there were fewer people held in South African prisons under apartheid than are currently incarcerated now: "According to the International Centre for Prison Studies, in 1992 – near the end of apartheid – South Africa had 104,790 prisoners and an incarceration rate of 285 per 100,000 population. As of August 2013 the nation had 156,370 prisoners at a rate of 294 per 100,000 population." Such is the cost of democracy and freedom.

When the South African police murdered 34 striking miners on August 16, 2012, it was under the auspices of Mandela's African National Congress (ANC); accordingly, the massacre met with little protest locally or internationally. I was in prison in the 1980s when a delegation of South African bankers returned from meeting with ANC representatives and one of them told a reporter, "We can do business with the ANC." After that, I concluded the days of apartheid were numbered. South African capitalism is stronger than ever thanks to Mandela, just as poor South Africans are poorer, more repressed and incarcerated than ever.

But this is what modern-day regime change looks like. While Mandela was roundly lauded upon his death, those not so fortunate, like Steve Biko, did not even get the luxury of a prison cell. Biko was beaten to death in September 1977 by members of BOSS. Today, political prisoners like Abimael Guzmán languish in solitary confinement in Peru after 21 years in captivity for leading a national liberation movement. In the United States, political prisoners like Mutulu Shakur, Herman Bell and Jalil Muntaqim, among many others, have been held in prison for decades after being convicted of armed struggle against the U.S. government. If President Obama were that concerned about political prisoners he could free some of the ones held in federal prisons, starting with Leonard Peltier, Oscar Lopez Rivera and those confined in the Guantanamo Bay military concentration camp in Cuba.

This month's cover story on Scandinavian prisons serves as a reminder that the U.S. police state and retributive criminal justice system are not the only models of social control. While there are undoubtedly prisons in other parts of the world that are "worse" than those in the United States, it is worth noting that as a general rule it is not a deliberate government policy in such countries to treat people poorly and cruelly as part of a punitive system, whereas the U.S. spends billions of dollars to do just that. No other nation imprisons as many people for so long as we do in America, the land of the not-so-free with liberty and justice for some – mainly those who can afford it.

Mangaung and Beyond: Private Prison Exemplifies South Africa's Criminal Justice Woes

by James Kilgore

IN RECENT MONTHS A BATTLE HAS erupted at Mangaung prison in South Africa. Mangaung, located near the city of Bloemfontein, is one of the country's two privately-operated correctional facilities. Managed by British-based G4S, which bills itself as the "world's largest security" company, Mangaung reflects a troubled criminal justice system littered with overcrowded, poorly resourced prisons. A September 2013 strike by guards from the Police and Prison Civil Rights Union (POPCRU) sparked the latest round of drama; the guards were protesting the dismissal of several shop stewards as well as poor working conditions. G4S responded by firing 300 prison staff.

In early October 2013, with the facility still reeling from the mass terminations, a female guard was held hostage for twelve hours. The next day another guard was stabbed. Speaking for G4S, company spokesman Andy Baker alleged that prisoners were being paid to destabilize Mangaung. "We assume it is linked to ongoing staffing strife," he told the media, implying the union was behind the attacks.

At that point, Minister of Correctional Services Sbu Ndebele stepped in and placed Mangaung under the direct supervision of the state, essentially terminating G4S's 25-year contract with the South African government signed in 2000. Ndebele claimed G4S management had lost "effective control over the prison." The move reflected a broader rejection of private prisons by the South African government:

Ndebele's predecessor, Nosiviwe Mapisa-Nqakula, had blocked the implementation of a bidding process for four more private prisons in 2011. As it presently stands, the country's only privately-operated facility is Kutama Sinthumule in Limpopo province, co-owned by Kensani Corrections (Pty) Ltd. and the Florida-based GEO Group.

Scandal – Nothing New for G4S

FOR MANY, THE EVENTS AT THE NEARLY 3,000-bed Mangaung prison are not surprising. Scandal is nothing new to G4S. The company grabbed global headlines when it failed to hire enough personnel to fulfill its £284 million contract to provide security for the 2012 Summer Olympics in London. More recently, British authorities have launched an investigation into the firm for allegedly overcharging the government for electronic monitoring services, including collecting fees for ankle monitors on people who were dead, and for allegedly altering official documents to facilitate the deportation of an asylum seeker.

POPCRU members welcomed Ndebele's takeover of Mangaung. According to a public statement issued by the union, "the incidents in Mangaung are an indication that privatization ... will never work." The union decried what it called a "wastage of public funds which could be invested in other critical programs."

While privatization remains a key issue, especially in regard to labor practices, G4S guards and other prison staff appear to have played crucial roles in the violence at Mangaung. Last year, a Johannesburg-based think tank, the Wits Justice Project, reported widespread patterns of staff abuse of prisoners. The researchers focused on members of the facility's Emergency Security Team (EST), also known as "Zulus" or "ninjas."

Thabo Godfrey Botsane, who served six years in Mangaung, spoke to the Wits researchers. He claimed the EST paid him a visit one night in his cell and ordered him to strip naked. "When I refused," he said, "they threw all my belongings out of the window. They doused me with water and shower gel and then started to kick and electroshock me with their shields. I was injured and bleeding after this assault."

Themba Tom worked at Mangaung from 2000 to 2008. He verified Botsane's account, stating that there was a place they called "the dark room because EST members would bring inmates there, strip them naked, pour water over them and electroshock them. We would try not to hear the crying and screaming. It was awful."

Apart from the use of electroshock, the Wits Justice Project also reported a pattern of forced medication of prisoners by EST members, typically involving powerful psychotropic drugs. Researchers obtained a video taken by prison staff that showed a team of guards holding down a prisoner named Bheki Dlamini while they reportedly gave him an antipsychotic drug called Etomine, which has serious side effects.

The film apparently shows Dlamini repeatedly screaming, “no, no, no” and telling the guards, “I am not a donkey, I am not an animal.” The researchers said Dlamini is not psychotic or schizophrenic but was reportedly being punished for complaining about Vienna sausages served for dinner.

Beyond Mangaung

ULTIMATELY, THE CONFLICT IN MANGAUNG is part of a larger struggle to reform criminal justice in South Africa. This process has drifted far from the ideals of reconciliation and restorative justice that inspired the movement to democracy which swept Nelson Mandela into power in 1994. Over the past decade-and-a-half, South Africa has carried out a program of U.S.-style mass incarceration, adopting policies like mandatory minimum sentences and zero tolerance.

According to the International Centre for Prison Studies, in 1992 – near the end of apartheid – South Africa had 104,790 prisoners and an incarceration rate of 285 per 100,000 population. As of August 2013 the nation had 156,370 prisoners at a rate of 294 per 100,000 population. Moreover, the number of prisoners serving life sentences has soared from 400 in 1995 to nearly 11,000 today.

Ndebele has called for a major rethinking of South Africa’s overall approach to incarceration. “It is quite shameful for a democratic country to have so many people in prison,” he told a South African Broadcasting Company reporter, “and we need to reduce that while not letting people get away with crime.”

His immediate plan to decarcerate includes an initiative to release 11,000 people from prison and place them on electronic monitoring. Ndebele has also proposed a number of programs that are unprecedented in South African prisons, ranging from compulsory Adult Basic Education classes to employing prisoners to perform labor for the state at less than minimum wage. In a 2012 interview, he cited school construction as one example of the type of work prisoners could do.

While Ndebele has taken important steps by sidelining G4S, launching an early release program and promoting rehabilitation, he has a difficult task in convincing fellow politicians and the voting public as to the need to soften South Africa’s stance on punishment. Certain realities work against his aspirations. For example, the country has an extremely high violent crime rate, with the 2012 murder rate being about six times that of the U.S. Lingering social inequities also present serious obstacles, including a national unemployment rate of 25.6% and, according to a recent Oxfam report, the highest level of income inequality on earth.

Although the Minister of Correctional Services may be getting a grip on the situation involving Mangaung and G4S, tackling the broader transformation of criminal justice in South Africa will require much more time and a considerable change in both public policy and the public’s mindset to yield lasting results. ■

Hidden Agenda Fuels Challenge to Pivotal Death Penalty Case

by David Protes

ANTHONY PORTER, THE EXONERATED death row prisoner whose jubilant release from prison in February 1999 was the catalyst for abolishing the death penalty in Illinois, is back in the news after living in relative obscurity for years. A lot has happened since reporters covered Porter's first steps to freedom, but brace yourself for who's behind his sudden return to the front page. Hint: it has less to do with the evidence than it does a reality TV show producer and a lawyer with ties to City Hall.

Our story traces to September 1998, when Porter came within 50 hours of execution before getting a stay. Months later, he was freed when the case against him crumbled. Witnesses recanted and an eyewitness swore she saw her estranged husband, Alstory Simon, commit the double murder that had landed Porter on death row. Simon soon confessed on videotape to a private investigator working with a team I led at Northwestern University.

Besides the overwhelming proof of Simon's guilt – the videotaped confession, his guilty plea to a judge, a tearful courtroom apology for the slayings, damning admissions to a Milwaukee TV reporter – it was Simon's failure to appeal that forever closed his case.

And yet, as has been widely reported, lawyers James Sotos and Terry Ekl rant that Simon is actually innocent and Porter guilty. The lawyers convinced State's Attorney Anita Alvarez to take a third look at the case, arguably making the matter newsworthy. I challenged the lawyers' claims and chastised the Chicago Tribune for an editorial that gave them credence. I also pointed out the dubious pedigrees of Sotos and Ekl, showing them to be shills for law enforcement whose likely purpose was to undermine the innocence movement by gutting its symbol.

Still, I wondered whether there was more to this story, curious about why the allegations erupted now when they were originally raised seven years ago – only to be shot down by every judge. Sure enough, a little digging shows that Porter has been dragged back into the spotlight for a more sinister reason. The motive is money.

Today, we look behind the curtain at two shadowy figures who have mounted the next phase of the assault on the truth. They have contrasting backgrounds, but a distinctly common purpose: Selling "Porter" – a made-for-TV movie about the case.

Christopher S. Rech, 48, runs a Cleveland-based production company, Pinpoint Media. Founded in 2009, Rech's outfit produces the popular "Crime Stoppers," a reality TV show that Rech describes as "an idea for catching bad guys... a local 'Americas [sic] Most Wanted' type program to generate leads that law enforcement can follow."

But Rech's latest project is "Porter," a documentary he expects to finish shooting in December 2013 and hopes to sell to cable TV by February. The recently-released trailer contains dramatic stuff, especially when Chicago attorney Andrew M. Hale proclaims this about the evidence that freed Porter from death row: "It was all one big lie."

Wait a minute. Andrew Hale? The go-to guy when Chicago's Law Department needs an outside lawyer to fight civil rights suits?

Yes, that guy. Between 2004 and 2012, City Hall paid $20.5 million to Hale and the other lawyers he's worked with to defend the City against dozens of police brutality and wrongful conviction lawsuits, according to an analysis of public records. About a quarter of the money was paid to fight claims by African-Americans who alleged they were tortured by disgraced Chicago police commander Jon Burge and his "Midnight Crew."

The conduct of the 51-year-old Hale and his firm was called into question by federal judges in eight cases during the same period, according to court filings. In one of those cases, Judge Matthew F. Kennelly found that Hale and his co-counsel made a "racially motivated" attempt to keep an African-American woman from being seated as a juror in a wrongful conviction lawsuit. Judge Ruben Castillo called Hale's behavior "unethical" while defending a police torture lawsuit brought by an 80-year-old South Side resident.

So what is Andrew Hale doing in a documentary about Anthony Porter?

It turns out Hale is a budding TV star whose sound bytes Rech featured three times in the trailer. But even more important, Hale is credited as the executive producer of the project.

Wondering what an "executive producer" does, I asked Hollywood director and producer Seth Gordon, whose films include the Oscar-winning documentary “Undeclared” and several wildly popular movies, including “Horrible Bosses,” “Identity Thief” and “Four Christmases.”

“The executive producer credit can signify a wide range of contribution,” Gordon explains. “It can mean the person gave or found money for the film,” he says, adding that “it’s generally safe to assume that an EP credit goes to someone who helped the documentary come into being.” What about a TV documentary? “In TV, the EP credit represents a far more significant contribution, usually being part of the genesis of the idea and ongoing management of its production.”

Is it possible that Hale provided the idea and money for “Porter”? I asked Rech. He didn’t hesitate.

“Andrew Hale brought the story to my attention,” Rech says. “He and I are sharing the production costs.”

How much are we talking about?

“I don’t want to get into budget specifics because that could affect the selling price of the film.”

Okay, what percentage of the project’s budget comes from Hale?

Then Rech tellingly adds: “Hale and I made the needed investments to hopefully create a great documentary that will be sold and turn a profit.”

So let’s get this straight. Andrew Hale makes millions at taxpayers’ expense defending brutal cops and contesting lawsuits by exonerated prisoners. He invests some money in a TV project that challenges the most famous death row exoneration of our times. Now he and his partner hope to turn a profit at the expense of a man who barely escaped lethal injection and was exonerated by prosecutors, the presiding judge and the governor.

Seventh Circuit: Lifetime Supervision in Pornography Case Set Aside

by Derek Gilna

THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS has overturned a "supervision for life" provision imposed by the U.S. District Court for the Western District of Wisconsin when defendant Nicolai D. Quinn was sentenced to 97 months imprisonment for possession of child pornography.

Both the Sentencing Guidelines and statute under which Quinn was convicted provided for the possibility of lifetime supervision. However, while his sentence was within the guidelines range and thus presumptively reasonable under Rita v. United States, 551 U.S. 338 (2007), the Court of Appeals noted that the district court still had an obligation to "consider a defendant's serious arguments for a sentence below the Sentencing Commission's recommendation."

Quinn had argued for a 10-year term of supervised release and submitted a forensic psychologist's evaluation as well as testimony from two psychologists, all of whom concluded "that he has a lower-than-normal risk of recidivism." Although the sentencing judge briefly discussed the forensic psychologist's findings, he did not discuss the testimony of the two psychologists, nor the length of supervision or its term.

The government confessed error and the Seventh Circuit agreed, noting that "a district judge must explain important decisions," including "arguments about recidivism" and "the interaction between the length and the terms of supervised release." The appellate court observed that Quinn "has a young child, whom he has never been accused of abusing," and who would have been barred from seeing Quinn without advance approval under the district court's sentencing order.

Finally, the Court of Appeals wrote that "Rules that allow public officials to regulate family life likewise call for special justification, and lifetime regulatory power is hard to support when the defendant has not been convicted of crimes against his family or other relatives. Other terms of Quinn's supervised release also may require strong justification when extended for a lifetime." The appellate court noted that the "more onerous the term, the greater the justification required."

Quinn's term of supervised release was vacated and the case remanded for resentencing as to the period of supervised release only. See: United States v. Quinn, 698 F.3d 651 (7th Cir. 2012). ■

Pennsylvania Woman Jailed for Failure to Pay Parking Tickets

THE INCREASED USE OF JAIL FOR DEBTORS resulted in a Pennsylvania woman being imprisoned for not paying parking ticket fines.

"It was a short and sweet hearing," stated Lancaster County Constable Karl Salisbury. "The judge said, 'you owe $2,300 collateral. You're being committed to Lancaster County Prison.'"

Salisbury then took bookstore owner Melody Williams, 36, to jail with no time to get her affairs in order. Williams' June 2012 incarceration resulted from her failure to completely pay $2,300 in fines for 11 tickets, most of which were for parking without a permit near her store, Winding Way Books.

While trying to keep her business afloat, Williams fell behind on paying the fines. In 2011 she paid a total of $1,088. For the first five months of 2012 she paid an average of $135 per month, and just an hour before Salisbury came to arrest her she had paid $80 on the arrears.

"Parking tickets shouldn't be something they come and take you away for," said Lancaster criminal defense attorney Richard MacDonald.

District Judge Bruce Roth, whose staff set up the payment plan for Williams, had no sympathy for her. "She just pushed it too far," he said. "She had too many payment plans that she defaulted on, too many hearings she didn't show up for. She had established herself as hopelessly unreliable."

For each day behind bars, Williams earned $40 credit toward her fines. That would mean 47 days before her debt was paid in full. Thanks to her landlord, however, Williams served only eight days. "The whole thing seems screwy to me," said Dennis Cox, who paid $1,500 to obtain Williams' release. "I thought debtor's prison went out with Charles Dickens." [See: PLN, Nov. 2013, p.20].

Attorneys point out that state law was not followed prior to Williams' imprisonment. Rule 456 of the Pennsylvania code requires the court to set a hearing to determine ability to pay when fines or costs are in default; a date to report is then set if the judge imposes a jail term unless an appeal is filed within 30 days. Also, counsel is to be appointed for indigents in such cases under Rule 122. Williams said she was not informed of those rules.

When asked whether justice had been served by incarcerating Williams, Judge Roth replied, "This was a harsh form of justice. I hope this was a wakeup call for her and a message to the citizens to please pay your tickets."

County Commissioner Scott Martin questioned the wisdom of imprisoning people for failure to pay fines – particularly sending them to the Lancaster County Prison, which is overcrowded. "That hard cell space is very valuable to us," he noted. "We need to take a look at how we handle the cases of those who owe money."

Lancaster attorney Steven Breit observed that a more basic issue was involved. "What you're looking at here is 'does the punishment fit the crime?'" he asked.

Williams thinks not. "Parking tickets should not be a jailable offense," she said. "I know there are people who are going to say 'that's what you get' and I'm okay with that. But there's got to be some alternative. I would have gladly done community service."

Ultimately the experience helped Williams connect with local residents who supported her, though had she served her entire jail term it would have devastated her bookstore business. "I'm so grateful for all the support I got from the community," she said in a June 30, 2013 news report. "I had a lot of people come in and buy books just to help me get back on my feet." ■

Controversy, Litigation and Performance Problems Plague Private Probation Services

by David M. Reutter and Alex Friedmann

DEFENDANTS WHO ARE PLACED ON probation and ordered to pay a growing array of fines and fees levied by local governments facing budget deficits, combined with additional fees charged by private companies hired to provide probation services, are increasingly being squeezed into burdensome debt and, all too frequently, jail.

"With so many towns economically strapped, there is growing pressure on the courts to bring in money rather than mete out justice," said Lisa W. Borden, a partner with the Birmingham, Alabama law firm of Baker, Donelson, Bearman, Caldwell & Berkowitz. "The companies they hire are aggressive. Those arrested are not told about the right to counsel or asked whether they are indigent or offered an alternative to fines and jail. There are real constitutional issues at stake."

Controversy: Probation for Profit

THE EXPERIENCES OF TWO ALABAMA residents exemplify the real costs faced by those subjected to criminal justice policies designed to balance budgets and generate profit. Gina Kay Ray, 31, received a $179 speeding ticket in 2009; her license was revoked for failure to appear in court, which she said occurred because the ticket had the wrong date.

Thus, the next time she was pulled over she was driving without a license. Her court fees totaled over $1,500 and her case was turned over to Judicial Correction Services, Inc. (JCS), a private probation company. Unable to pay, she landed in jail – and to add insult to injury, she was charged for each day she spent behind bars. Ray, who is unemployed, has been jailed three times totaling 40 days. She still owes $3,170 in fees and fines, mostly to JCS.

Another Alabama citizen, Richard Earl Garrett, can empathize. A former United States Steel Corp. employee who is out of work and suffers from medical problems, Garrett has spent 24 months in jail and owes $10,000 for traffic and driver's license violations over the past decade. His case also was handled by JCS.

These are not isolated incidents; JCS provides probation services to more than 100 Alabama courts, as well as court systems in Georgia, Florida and Mississippi.

Georgia has extensive experience with private probation companies. With around 40 for-profit probation services operating in over 640 courts statewide, impoverished defendants live in fear of being jailed due to their inability to pay fines or fees. [See: PLN, June 2010, p.22].

The rise of private probation companies in the Peach State can be traced to a corruption scandal involving former Georgia parole board chairman (and former director of the state's prison system) Bobby K. Whitworth. While serving in public office, Whitworth received $75,000 from Detention Management Services (DMS) – a private probation firm – to draft and lobby for a 2000 bill, SB 474, that drastically expanded privatized probation services by shifting misdemeanor probation supervision from the Department of Corrections to individual counties.

A Georgia statute, O.C.G.A. § 42-8-100(g)(1), specifically authorizes counties to contract with private companies that provide probation services.

Charged with abusing his office, Whitworth was convicted in 2003 and sentenced to six months in jail, 100 hours of community service, a $50,000 fine and, ironically, 4½ years on probation. [See: PLN, April 2006, p.10; March 2003, p.1]. DMS was later acquired by another private probation company, Sentinel Offender Services, LLC.

A July 2, 2012 article in The New York Times highlighted the experience of one Georgia resident whose case was assigned to a private probation company.

FCC Reg. No. 0021217047

Hills McGee pleaded no contest to two misdemeanors in October 2008. Despite the fact that McGee lived on a monthly income of $243 in veteran's benefits, the court assessed a $270 fine and placed him on two years' probation with Sentinel Offender Services. The company charged him a $15 enrollment fee and $39 in monthly fees, which increased his debt to over $750 during the first year. Unable to pay, McGee, 53, was eventually jailed.

Stephen B. Bright, president of the Southern Center for Human Rights, said courts are increasingly using fines and fees "for such things as the retirement funds for various court officials, law enforcement functions such as police training and crime laboratories, victim assistance programs and even the court's computer system." As a result, he said, "we end up balancing the budget on the backs of the poorest people in our society."

The Southern Center for Human Rights issued a report in July 2008, "Profiting from the Poor," that examined private probation services in Georgia and found that such services lead to unequal justice for destitute defendants.

"The privatization of misdemeanor probation has placed unprecedented law enforcement authority in the hands of for-profit companies that act essentially as collection agencies," the report stated. "These companies, focused on profit rather than public safety or rehabilitation, are not designed to supervise people or connect them to services and jobs. Rather, they charge exorbitant monthly fees and use the threat of imprisonment and a variety of bullying tactics to squeeze money out of the men and women under their supervision."

A 2010 study by the Brennan Center for Justice examined fee structures in the 15 states with the largest prison populations. "Many states are imposing new and often onerous 'user fees' on individuals with criminal convictions. Yet far from being easy, these fees impose severe – and often hidden – costs on communities, taxpayers, and indigent people convicted of crimes. They create new paths to prison for those unable to pay their debts and make it harder to find employment and housing as well as to meet child support obligations," the Brennan Center wrote. [See: PLN, May 2011, p.40].

"Although debtors' prison is illegal in all states, reincarcerating individuals for failure to pay debt is, in fact, common in some," the study found. [See, e.g.: PLN, Nov. 2013, p.20; July 2011, p.40].

In an interview with The New York Times, J. Scott Vowell, then presiding judge of Alabama's 10th Judicial Circuit, said the state's legislature has pressured courts to generate revenue through the collection of fines and fees.

That issue was highlighted in a 2011-2012 policy paper, "Courts are Not Revenue Centers," released by the nonpartisan Conference of State Court Administrators. With respect to traffic violations, the paper noted, "court leaders face the greatest challenge in ensuring that fines, fees, and surcharges are not simply an alternative form of taxation."

because they can't pay a fine," said William M. Dawson, a Birmingham attorney who has sued JCS and local authorities in the town of Harpersville, Alabama on behalf of Richard Garrett and several other plaintiffs.

The suit alleges that JCS does not discuss alternatives to fines or jail and that its training manual "is devoid of any discussion of indigency or waiver of fees" for poor defendants, who have been harassed by the company and sometimes arrested and jailed for failure to pay.

On July 11, 2012, Shelby County Circuit Court Judge Hub Harrington entered an order in the case that essentially took control over the Harpersville Municipal Court due to an "institutional, egregious and undisputed pattern and practice of Constitutional and statutory violations," which he wrote "could reasonably be characterized as the operation of a debtors' prison" and constituted a "judicially sanctioned extortion racket."

Judge Harrington found that defendants were placed on probation without an adjudication by the court or sentencing order; placed on probation with JCS only after they were unable to pay all fines and costs assessed on the day of trial; incarcerated for probation violations, including for failure to pay fees, without an adjudication by the court or sentencing order; incarcerated for failure to appear in court after being ordered to do so by JCS; placed on "extended" probation for years beyond the statutory maximum; and charged "unconscionable fines and fees."

On August 8, 2012, the Harpersville Town Council voted to abolish the municipal court, with all cases to be transferred to the county district court.

The class-action lawsuit remains pending on the issue of damages against the town and JCS. See: Burdette v. Town of Harpersville, Circuit Court for Shelby County (AL), Case No. CV 2010-900183.

Dawson also represents Gina Ray in a federal class-action suit filed against JCS and the city of Childersburg, Alabama. The lawsuit alleges that Ray and another plaintiff, Deuante T. Jews, were charged illegal fees and jailed when they were unable to pay.

According to the complaint, "should an individual fail to pay to the satisfaction of JCS, these defendants will revoke probation, impose additional fines and costs and incarcerate the individual and/or impose unreasonable bond requirements, without conducting delinquency or probation hearings and without making any findings, much less any determination of indigency before taking such punitive action."

An attorney representing JCS claimed the suit contained "ridiculous allegations, which are patently false." The case remains pending. See: Ray v. Judicial Corrections Services, U.S.D.C. (N.D. Ala.), Case No. 2:12-cv-02819-RDP.

"We hear a lot of 'I can't pay the fee.' It is not our job to figure that out," said Kevin Egan, JCS's chief marketing officer, who noted the company has doubled the percentage of completed sentences in jurisdictions where it is contracted to provide probation services.

Of course, the company's heavy-handed approach to collecting fines and fees, which includes issuing probation violations for defendants unable to pay, resulting in their incarceration, may have something to do with JCS's "success" rate.

"These companies are bill collectors, but they are given the authority to say to someone that if he doesn't pay, he is going to jail," said Augusta, Georgia attorney John B. Long. "There are things like garbage collection where private companies are O.K. No one's liberty is affected. The closer you get to locking someone up, the closer you get to a constitutional issue."

Long represented Hills McGee in a lawsuit against Sentinel Offender Services, which had continued to press McGee to pay probation fees even after a state court granted his petition for habeas corpus, effectively ending his term of probation. McGee's suit sought to hold Sentinel in contempt for "using its position as a probation company to attempt to collect a debt that is not owed or due by threatening to have [him] jailed without bond."

The suit also alleged a state law Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organization (RICO) claim against Sentinel for engaging in theft by deception, and challenged the Georgia statute that authorizes counties to contract with private probation companies. The case was removed to federal court in April 2010, which issued an injunction "forbidding Sentinel from taking any action to collect any fee or to have any arrest warrant issued that would interfere with the habeas relief granted McGee" by the state court.

However, the U.S. District Court later granted summary judgment to Sentinel on the RICO claim and held it did not have jurisdiction to hear McGee's statutory challenge. That judgment was affirmed by the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals in June 2013. See: McGee v. Sentinel Offender Services, 719 F.3d 1236 (11th Cir. 2013).

Additionally, on September 16, 2013, a Georgia superior court issued a combined ruling in eight lawsuits seeking injunctive relief and damages against Sentinel Offender Services; the suits claimed the company had "unlawfully collected excessive supervision fees and employed other procedures to obtain money from probationers."

The court held that the Georgia statute authorizing private probation services does not deprive defendants of due process or equal protection, nor does it "unconstitutionally condone imprisonment for debt."

The superior court also found that private probation companies do not have authority to extend the original term of a probated sentence, and that the plaintiffs were "entitled to recover from Sentinel any probation supervision fees collected" after their probation had ended. Further, the company must return any fees collected for electronic monitoring in violation of state law.

The court granted the plaintiffs' motion for partial summary judgment against Sentinel with respect to the improper collection of fees, and certified a class-action case as to that issue.

The class representative, Nathan R. Mantooth, had been sentenced to one year of probation for a traffic violation, and ordered to pay a $420 fine and complete a driver improvement course. He paid the fine and finished the course, but was jailed after Sentinel claimed he had violated his probation. See: Mantooth v. Sentinel Offender Services, Superior Court of Richmond County (GA), Case No. 2013-RCCV-155.

Performance Problems Reported

MOST RECENTLY, SENTINEL OFFENDER Services has been in the news for failing to properly monitor probationers in several California counties. A November 13, 2013 "contract discrepancy report" by Los Angeles County's probation department found that 26% of Sentinel's GPS tracking devices were faulty.

Problems with the GPS equipment included batteries that did not hold a charge and defective monitors that issued excessive false alarms; as a result, some probationers were not being monitored.

"If you have faulty technology, that is a recipe for disaster," remarked Reaver Bingham, deputy chief of the county's probation department.

Probationers on GPS monitoring in Los Angeles County include high-risk sex offenders and felons who have been released from prison to the county's custody. The report by the probation department noted that in some cases Sentinel allowed offenders to continue wearing GPS monitors that the company knew were defective. In other cases, Sentinel simply stopped monitoring probationers.

Further, the company had failed to maintain accurate records related to GPS equipment malfunctions and case notes concerning interactions with probationers.

County investigators found that only 3 of 197 offenders had case notes in their files prior to July 1, 2013, while there were no such records for 87 probationers from July 1 through October 31, 2013.

Sentinel blamed insufficiently trained probation officers and probationers who did not properly maintain their GPS monitors – for example, by failing to charge the batteries correctly. The company said it had attempted to contact county officials about those problems without success.

Previously, in June 2013, Orange County, California canceled its contract with Sentinel after officials found repeated failures with the company's GPS monitoring and home detention equipment.

Sentinel was recently awarded a contract by the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department, valued at $7 million, to monitor up to 1,000 offenders. ■

Task Force Linked to Harsh Sentencing Laws and Private Prison Firms Disbands Following Public Scrutiny, Boycott

A NATIONAL CAMPAIGN TO SHUT DOWN a quasi-governmental task force backed by powerful corporate interests, which has promoted harsher sentences, prison privatization and controversial “stand your ground” gun rights legislation, was successful thanks to public pressure and a boycott started by the Occupy Wall Street movement.

The American Legislative Exchange Council (ALEC), purportedly a “non-partisan” non-profit organization, brings together mostly Republican state lawmakers and corporations to develop business- and conservative-friendly model bills that are then distributed among state legislatures nationwide. Lawmakers and corporate officials mingle at “public-private partnership” conferences that are closed to the public, and the model legislation is produced by nine ALEC task forces. About 20% of the model bills are eventually passed into law; the organization has been described as a “bill mill.”

ALEC begrudgingly announced in April 2012 that it was caving in to efforts by the Center for Media and Democracy and the Occupy movement, and would disband its Public Safety & Elections Task Force – which had promoted harsher sentencing laws, anti-immigrant legislation and the self-serving interests of the private prison industry since the late 1980s. [See, e.g.: PLN, Jan. 2002, p.1].

The task force, previously known as the Criminal Justice Task Force, also promoted stand your ground laws – which gained national attention after the February 26, 2012 shooting death of 17-year-old Tray-von Martin in Florida – as well as voter suppression efforts across the U.S. and the Private Correctional Facilities Act, which authorized state governments to contract with private prison companies.

In the 1990s, ALEC drafted model legislation for mandatory minimum sentences, truth in sentencing and three-strikes laws, all of which drove up incarceration rates. Corrections Corporation of America (CCA) executives John Rees and Brad Wiggins served on ALEC’s Criminal Justice Task Force in the 1990s and early 2000s when such legislation was being developed. [See: PLN, Jan. 2012, p.20].

Also, in the late 1990s, CCA helped Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker (then a state representative) push legislation that would allow private prisons to operate in Wisconsin and house prisoners from other states.

While those bills failed to pass, Walker and ALEC were successful in pushing through truth in sentencing legislation in 1997, which required prisoners to serve their full sentences without the possibility of parole or supervised release.

More recently, CCA was reportedly involved in Arizona’s controversial anti-immigration law, SB1070, introduced in 2009 by since-recalled state senator and ALEC member Russell Pearce, which was expected to increase the number of immigrants held in detention – such as in CCA’s three ICE detention facilities in Arizona. [See: PLN, Nov. 2010, p.1].

Although both CCA and GEO Group – the nation’s two largest prison companies – have participated in ALEC previously, they are no longer members; CCA reportedly left the organization in 2011. CCA and GEO have denied that they lobby for harsher sentencing laws or increased reliance on incarceration; however, their participation in ALEC, if not to influence such legislation, hasn’t been adequately explained. [See: PLN, Nov. 2012, p.26; March 2011, p.1].

Following the death of Trayvon Martin, a boycott targeting ALEC’s corporate members was launched in February 2012 by Occupy Portland (Oregon) and spread nationwide, ultimately costing ALEC hundreds of members and over $1 million in funding.

The boycott forced ALEC’s corporate membership “to make a more careful, deliberate choice about what kind of political speech it actually wanted to support and put its reputation behind,” the Roosevelt Institute’s Mark Schmitt wrote in the New Republic.

On December 6, 2013, The Guardian published an extensive report on ALEC, based on internal records, that indicated over 400 lawmakers and 60 corporate members had left the organization due to controversy created by the boycott and public scrutiny. As a result, ALEC’s budget dropped by over one-third of projected income in the first six months of 2013: It collected $1.4 million less than the $3.9 million it expected.

Some of the companies that have canceled their ALEC membership include Coca-Cola, Pepsi, McDonald’s, Home Depot, General Electric, Amazon, Walmart, Bank of America and Visa. According to

The Guardian, ALEC has started a “Prodigal Son Project” to entice the companies that left to renew their lapsed memberships.

“This is a reflection of the power of sunlight on their activities – for too many years they were operating largely in secret. Corporations are sensitive to these issues,” stated Lisa Graves, executive director of the Center for Media and Democracy, which started its ALEC Exposed Project in early 2011 by analyzing more than 800 of the organization’s model bills.

Not everyone disagrees with ALEC’s conservative and corporate-friendly agenda. Companies that continue to support ALEC reportedly include Google (despite its slogan of “don’t be evil”), AT&T, Chevron, State Farm Insurance, Philip Morris International, Shell and Time Warner Cable, as well as organizations such as Right on Crime, Justice Fellowship and the Charles Koch Institute. Plus 1,810 lawmakers remain members.

“I first came to ALEC over a decade ago. When I was serving in the Bush administration, I’d been privileged to work with ALEC in the federal government,” U.S. Senator Ted Cruz (R-Texas) said on December 5, 2013. “I’ve been privileged to work with ALEC when I was back in Texas with the Texas Public Policy Foundation, leading the 10th Amendment Center, and I’m proud to stand with ALEC today.” Cruz told the organization to “stand your ground.”

It’s worth noting that the successful boycott of ALEC stemmed from a shooting incident tied to a single piece of model legislation produced by the organization, while for decades ALEC has developed thousands of model bills – some designed to increase sentences, expand the nation’s prison system and benefit private prison firms – without public scrutiny, interest or opposition.

ALEC’s decision to disband its Public Safety & Elections Task Force “is a partial victory for the power of grassroots citizen action,” said Graves. “But for Americans concerned about brand-name corporations underwriting ALEC’s extreme agenda,” she added, the organization’s “PR maneuver to try to distance itself from its record of extremism is an empty gesture unless it and the corporations that have bankrolled its operations work to repeal ALEC-backed laws.”

to its tax-exempt status by opponents who claim it engages in lobbying efforts in violation of IRS rules for non-profits, which has also made potential donors hesitant to contribute to the organization. To address this issue ALEC is reportedly founding a sister group, the Jeffersonian Project, that would be formed as a 501(c)(4) organization – which would allow it to participate in political activities to a greater extent.

According to notes from an August 6, 2013 ALEC board meeting, “Any activity that could be done by ALEC may be done by Jeffersonian Project if legal counsel advises it would provide greater legal protection or lessen ethics concerns.” Additionally, the separate group would remove “questions of ethical violations made by our critics and state ethics boards and [provide] further legal protection.” ALEC also noted that the Jeffersonian Project would be a “new revenue source ... and will lead to increased funding.”

East Mississippi Prison Nightmare

by Christopher Zoukis

ON MAY 30, 2013, THE AMERICAN Civil Liberties Union, Southern Poverty Law Center and law office of civil rights attorney Elizabeth Alexander filed an 83-page complaint in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Mississippi, seeking class-action relief for mentally ill prisoners confined in “barbaric and horrifying conditions” and “a perpetual state of crisis” at the privately-operated East Mississippi Correctional Facility (EMCF).

According to the complaint, prisoners at EMCF live in dangerous conditions and are constantly at “grave risk of death and loss of limbs” due to a lack of adequate food, sanitation and basic medical care and medication.

The suit alleges that many prisoners are housed in cells with no lighting and broken toilets, forcing them to defecate on food trays or in plastic bags that they toss through slots in the cell doors. So filthy is EMCF that rats often climb over prisoners’ beds, and some prisoners catch them and put them on leashes as pets.

According to the lawsuit, one prisoner went blind from glaucoma and another had a finger amputated after receiving no treatment for gangrene. Another prisoner had a testicle removed after it swelled to the size of a softball from cancer that went untreated.

“Prisoner-on-prisoner stabbings and beatings are frequent because the locking mechanism on the cell doors can be readily defeated, and some officers are complicit in unlocking doors to allow violence to occur,” the lawsuit alleges. One section of the prison used for solitary confinement is known as “the dead area” or “the dead zone,” because guards avoid the area, leaving prisoners to set fires to get their attention while the guards simply let the fires burn out. “The air is so contaminated from frequent fires that some prisoners expel black mucus from their noses,” the complaint states.

Opened in 1999, EMCF was designated to house and treat mentally ill prisoners for the Mississippi Department of Corrections (DOC). The facility holds up to 1,500 prisoners and has been operated by a series of for-profit companies since it opened. The current contractor is Utah-based Management & Training Corporation (MTC), which has run the facility since July 2012 after private prison firm GEO Group pulled out of its contracts to operate EMCF and two other facilities. [See: PLN, Nov. 2013, p.30].

In June 2012, the Occupational Safety and Health Administration released a report indicating it had fined GEO $104,000 for health and safety violations at EMCF in 2011 – including exposing employees to workplace violence, failing to take action to reduce the risk of violence and not repairing malfunctioning locks on cell doors.

MTC was not named as a defendant in the lawsuit concerning conditions at EMCF. Company spokesman Issa Arnita said in June 2013 that the situation had improved since the time of the incidents alleged in the suit; for example, prisoner-on-prisoner assaults had dropped 74% while use of force incidents decreased 60%.

“Operationally, it’s a much better place, not just for the offenders, but the employees,” said EMCF Warden Frank Shaw.

Jody Owens, executive director of the Jackson, Mississippi office for the Southern Poverty Law Center (SPLC), disagreed. “We were there two weeks ago,” he noted. “This is happening right now.”

According to the complaint, Mississippi DOC officials have known about the “grossly inhumane conditions” at EMCF but failed to take steps to protect prisoners at the facility. “Rapes, stabbings, beatings, and other acts of violence are rampant,” the lawsuit states, noting that a 16-year-old was placed in a cell with an adult prisoner who sexually assaulted him. Another prisoner, William Eastwood, was repeatedly raped at knifepoint in February 2012 by a prisoner who snorted cocaine during the assault. Eastwood’s cries for help were ignored by a guard who walked away when the assailant told him everything was okay, the complaint alleges. Other mentally ill prisoners have committed suicide at EMCF after guards ignored repeated warning signs.

In 2011, a national correctional health-care expert, Dr. Terry Kupers, wrote a report criticizing EMCF for inadequate mental health staffing. At that time EMCF had only one full-time psychiatrist despite its mission to treat mentally ill prisoners. According to the lawsuit, the psychiatrist’s hours dropped to two days a week after the state hired Health Assurance, LLC, a for-profit company, to provide mental health care at EMCF. Kupers also reported that prisoners were “much thinner, almost emaciated” due to “significant weight loss.”

Gabriel B. Eber, staff counsel for the ACLU’s National Prison Project, said conditions at EMCF are “the worse I’ve ever seen, and I’ve been in prisons all around the country.”

The ACLU has filed suit against Mississippi over prison conditions before. It sued on behalf of prisoners in Unit 32 at the State Penitentiary at Parchman concerning inhumane conditions [see: PLN, Feb. 2011, p.22], and again in 2010 over abuses at the Walnut Grove Youth Correctional Facility; the SPLC was co-counsel in the latter case. [See: PLN, Nov. 2013, p.30]. The lawsuits ultimately led to major reforms.

“The East Mississippi Correctional Facility is a cesspool,” said Eber. “When you combine solitary confinement, abuse, lack of medical and mental health care, and denial of basic human needs, it’s a recipe for disaster. [EMCF] is a throwback to the brutal prisons of decades ago, and the Mississippi Department of Corrections must do better.”

“Do we still have issues?” asked EMCF Warden Shaw. “Sure. It’s a prison. It’s the nature of the business. But we do everything we can to make it better for the offenders and the employees.”

At a gathering of prisoners’ family members outside the DOC’s headquarters in Jackson on May 30, 2013, Katie Autry said that her son, who is incarcerated at EMCF and has bipolar disorder and a form of schizophrenia, had been “in isolation, in chains, for the past three months.” She stated, “I saw him yesterday, and he looks terrible. He’s lost probably 100 pounds.”

Owens said the SPLC and ACLU had raised the concerns described in the lawsuit in a May 15, 2012 letter sent to Mississippi DOC Commissioner Chris Epps, but there was no reply. Epps claimed through a spokesperson that he never saw the letter and, in a written statement, noted the Department of Corrections had met with the ACLU and SPLC in the past and had “taken their suggestions” as to other prison-related issues.

The gathering of prisoners’ family members at the DOC’s headquarters focused on what they called the inhumane treatment of prisoners and EMCF’s management by a series of for-profit contractors. “Please don’t put a price tag on our loved ones,” said Autry. “Make sure they get the help they desperately need.” She added, “Since my son has been in East Mississippi, I have seen his mental state – his mental state got worse, not better.”

On November 22, 2013, the district court granted the plaintiffs’ motion for a protective order in the lawsuit related to production of prisoners’ confidential medical records during the discovery process. The case remains pending. See: Dockery v. Epps, U.S.D.C. (S.D. Miss.), Case No. 3:13-cv-00326-TSL-JMR. ■

Massachusetts Supreme Court: 90 Days in Segregation on Awaiting Action Status without Hearing Violates Due Process

THE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF Massachusetts has ruled that prisoners held in segregated confinement on "awaiting action" status are entitled to due process protections, and such prisoners may not be kept in segregation longer than 90 days without a hearing.

The Court's November 27, 2012 decision resolved a civil rights action brought by Souza-Baranowski Correctional Center (SBCC) prisoner Edmund LaChance. LaChance was in a protective custody unit at SBCC when he received a disciplinary report on December 21, 2005 for throwing a cup of pudding on another prisoner.

He was assigned to SBCC's special management unit (SMU) for seven days as a sanction. After learning of the punishment, LaChance "threatened to commit violence" against the other prisoner, which resulted in another seven-day SMU term. However, he remained in the SMU on awaiting action status for more than ten months after his 14-day disciplinary sanction ended; during that period he received "only informal status reviews." He was returned to the protective custody unit in November 2006.

After five months in the SMU, LaChance filed suit. He claimed the segregation conditions were more restrictive than in the protective custody unit and were substantially similar to those in the Departmental Segregation Unit (DSU).

The superior court agreed and found LaChance's due process rights had been violated when he was denied the procedural protections afforded by DSU regulations.

The superior court therefore granted partial summary judgment to LaChance on his claim for declaratory relief. The court further granted the defendants' cross-motion for summary judgment on claims for damages in their official capacity, but held they were not entitled to qualified immunity in their individual capacity. The defendants appealed and the Supreme Court transferred the case to its docket.

The Court agreed with the superior court that LaChance's ten-month stint in the SMU gave rise to a liberty interest that entitled him to due process protections, as the conditions of confinement in the SMU "constituted the sort of 'atypical and significant hardship' that triggers a right to procedural safeguards," and "bore notable similarities to conditions which the United States Supreme Court has described as 'synonymous with extreme isolation.'"

LaChance was never given a hearing or advised what steps he could take to mitigate the perceived need for his continued segregation. While the acceptable length of administrative segregation is governed by the "rule of reason," the Supreme Judicial Court said the outer limits of segregated confinement had never been articulated.

mulgate regulations to balance the interests related to segregating prisoners, but held that "in no circumstances may an inmate be held in segregated confinement on awaiting action status for longer than ninety days without a hearing." Because the Supreme Court announced for the first time this rule concerning time limits on the placement of prisoners in segregation absent a hearing, the defendants could not have reasonably known their conduct was unlawful at the time LaChance was confined in the SMU, entitling them to qualified immunity.

Therefore, the superior court's order was affirmed in all respects except as to the qualified immunity issue, and the lower court was instructed to enter an order granting summary judgment to the defendants in their individual capacity. See: LaChance v. Commissioner of Correction, 463 Mass. 767, 978 N.E.2d 1199 (Mass. 2012).

The ACLU filed a friend of the court brief in this case and hailed the Supreme Court's ruling. "This is an exciting decision for Massachusetts – and for the rest of the nation," said Amy Fettig, senior staff counsel with the ACLU's National Prison Project. "This decision sets a good example for courts to start reining in the excessive use of solitary confinement in prisons that has been allowed to fester without proper legal restraints." ■

Washington Defendant Improperly Denied Transcript at State Expense

THE WASHINGTON STATE SUPREME Court held in a November 8, 2012 en banc ruling that an indigent defendant was improperly denied a jury voir dire transcript.

When appealing his convictions for first-degree murder, second-degree murder and two counts of unlawful possession of a firearm, Merle William Harvey requested a jury voir dire transcript at public expense. He needed the transcript to prove his claim that the public was improperly excluded from the courtroom during jury selection. The trial court refused and the Court of Appeals affirmed.

Relying on a relative's sworn declaration that she had been turned away from the courtroom during voir dire, Harvey briefed the issue in the absence of the transcript. The appellate court rejected his argument, however, finding that it "was not supported by the record provided." Harvey sought discretionary review, which was granted.

The Washington Supreme Court reversed, stating, "Harvey contends that the trial court erred by closing the courtroom during jury selection. Without a transcript of voir dire, the reviewing court cannot properly consider this claim." As such, the trial court had "erroneously refused to order that portion of the record transcribed at public expense."

The Court noted that "It is well established that '[t]he State must provide indigent criminal defendants with means of presenting their contentions on appeal which are as good as those available to nonindigent defendants with similar contentions,'" pursuant to Draper v. Washington, 372 U.S. 487, 496 (1963).

"Harvey need not make a particularized factual showing to be entitled to transcripts but need only demonstrate a colorable need," the Supreme Court explained. "He has done so. He is therefore entitled to transcription of the jury voir dire at public expense." Harvey represented himself pro se. See: Washington v. Harvey, 175 Wn.2d 919, 288 P.3d 1111 (Wash. 2012) (en banc). ■

Programs Proliferate for Incarcerated Veterans

AN INCREASING NUMBER OF CRIMINAL justice programs are being made available to military veterans who have been charged with or convicted of crimes, including specialized prison and jail housing units and court diversion programs.

According to a report by the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) based on 2004 data, approximately 9.4% of state and federal prisoners are veterans. That is roughly equivalent to the percentage of veterans in the general population, which was 10.4% based on census data from the same time period as the DOJ report.

Veterans courts – similar to drug courts and mental health courts – have been established in around 32 states, primarily in Pennsylvania, Texas, California, Illinois, Michigan and Wisconsin. The first veterans court was founded in Buffalo, New York in 2008, and provides veterans with treatment, support, training, housing and mentors.

A Toledo Blade editorial endorsing a court diversion program for veterans in Ohio stated the program recognizes “the service of veterans to their country, acknowledges that some carry serious psychological and physical problems, including post-traumatic stress syndrome and alcoholism, and connects them to a range of services they might not have known about.”

Offenders with low-level felonies or misdemeanors, including drug possession, DUI and assault, are typically placed on probation in veterans courts. They are required to get counseling through the Veterans Administration (VA), address their addiction problems, and undergo regular testing for drugs and alcohol.

A national inventory by VA Veterans Justice Programs found there were 168 courts, dockets and tracks designated for veterans charged with crimes as of the end of calendar year 2012.

In addition to veterans courts, a number of prisons and jails nationwide have developed special housing units for prisoners who served in the military.

In Columbus, Georgia, Sheriff John Darr said he created a 16-bed unit for veterans at the Muscogee County Jail to help break the cycle of recidivism. The program provides “specialist services” which include a community group that assists incarcerated veterans who have mental illnesses, including post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) and depression.

we’re bringing together is a lot of resources.” He added, “If [veterans] are not dealing with issues they may have, where are they going to go? They’re going to go to local county jails.”

In Virginia, a barracks-style dorm opened in November 2012 at the medium-security Indian Creek Correctional Center, and a special veterans unit was launched at the State Correctional Institution (SCI) in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania in January 2013.

The veterans unit at Indian Creek reminds Raymond Riddick – one of about 2,000 Virginia state prisoners who identify themselves as veterans – of U.S. Navy boot camp.

“Only, the beds weren’t bolted to the floor” at the boot camp, he said.

Around 60 prisoners in the veterans unit at Indian Creek are supervised by guards who also have military backgrounds. Logos of every branch of the military are painted above the entrance to the dorm, and the prisoners’ job assignments have military themes: “mess crews” work in the kitchen, a “hazmat team” cleans up spills and an “intel coordinator” works to gather information on veterans programs to assist prisoners after their release.

At SCI-Pittsburgh, the facility’s B Block houses up to 250 veterans who receive treatment for PTSD and drug and alcohol problems, and are taught how to turn their past military experience into employment opportunities.

“Most of them did something prior to service or during service that makes them employable,” said William Woods, a deputy superintendent at SCI-Pittsburgh. “By kind of putting those guys together in a squad or a group, it allows them to share their experiences to help each other out. It looks at building camaraderie based on what they’ve gone through in the service.”

A number of California jails have developed programs for veterans, too. The Veterans Moving Forward unit, which opened on November 1, 2013 at the Vista Detention Facility in San Diego, is painted red, white and blue. Prisoners in the unit take classes related to issues such as PTSD, anger management, parenting and substance abuse. There are incentives for veterans to participate in the program, including extra visits, access to a vending machine and more recreation and TV time.

“This initiative brings the resources to the veterans while they’re in our facilities and then assists in their transition back to the community,” stated San Diego County Sheriff Bill Gore.

Nearly 300 prisoners are housed in veterans dorms in the Los Angeles County jail system, while 48 veterans reside in a separate unit at a San Bruno jail operated by the San Francisco Sheriff’s Department.

The Florida Department of Corrections provides veterans units at five facilities that each house around 400 prisoners, where participants are required to adhere to strict rules and take part in flag raising and retiring ceremonies each day. [See: PLN, Dec. 2012, p.14].

In October 2013, a housing unit for veterans opened at the Erie County Holding Center in New York; it is believed to be the first jail unit designated for veterans in that state. “If anybody deserves a second chance, it’s the men who put their lives on the line to defend our nation,” said Sheriff Timothy Howard.

Even Maricopa County, Arizona Sheriff Joe Arpaio, who is infamous for his abusive treatment and humiliation of prisoners, recently opened a jail unit for around 250 veterans. Announcing the unit on December 3, 2013, Arpaio wrote: “When you made the choice to serve your country in the Armed Forces, you wrote a blank check to all citizens promising to defend their freedom and way of life unconditionally. This program is our way of letting you know that we have not forgotten that commitment despite whatever circumstances in your life have landed you into the custody of the Maricopa County Sheriff’s Office.”

Such programs are laudable; however, prison and jail officials should consider extending the rehabilitative, treatment and assistance resources offered in veterans units to non-veteran prisoners – many of whom also have substance abuse and mental health problems, and who also could benefit from a second chance. Although incarcerated veterans have served their country they have also committed crimes – just like other prisoners, who are equally deserving of similar programs and opportunities. ■

Arizona TV Reporter Blames Prisoners for Citizens' Lack of Healthcare

WHEN LYNETTE BARRETT WAS SEARCHING for someone to blame for her husband's battle with liver disease and his long wait for a transplant, a TV reporter was quick to point his finger at America's favorite scapegoat: prisoners.

Morgan Loew, a reporter for KPHO in Phoenix, Arizona, concluded during a May 2012 broadcast that Barrett's husband, Murray, had been waiting nine years for a new liver because the Arizona Department of Corrections (ADC) provides "life-saving" medical care to prisoners and, more specifically, to those on death row.

Loew's investigative report revealed that on November 20, 2011, the ADC gave convicted murderer Robert Moorman – who was awaiting execution for killing his adoptive mother in 1984 – a quintuple heart bypass at "taxpayers' expense," only to execute him three months later.

Meanwhile, Murray Barrett has had three hospital stays, each costing more than $50,000, and he and his wife have had to pay $100,000 upfront for his treatment because they were dropped from the state's Medicaid system – as have thousands of other Arizonans.

For viewers who didn't see the correlation between Moorman's bypass surgery and Barrett's need for a liver transplant, Loew edified them: "Some of these condemned inmates are receiving the kind of state-funded medical care being denied to law-abiding citizens who don't have health insurance," he stated.

And because constitutional and human rights continue to be foreign concepts in Arizona, Loew asked Dan Pochoda, legal director of the Arizona ACLU, "Why does the state pay for healthcare for prisoners?"

"Because there's no choice," Pochoda told him, likely wondering why he would have to explain that the state must provide medical care to prisoners because they have no other way to receive treatment – and that the failure to provide care for serious medical conditions is a violation of the Eighth Amendment.

Apparently oblivious to such constitutional requirements, Loew also failed to mention that at the time Moorman received bypass surgery he had neither exhausted his final attempt to have his sentence commuted nor had his execution date been scheduled. But that would have complicated Loew's premise that Barrett's inability to obtain a liver transplant was somehow related to the healthcare that prisoners receive.

In reality, as most people know who have served time, medical treatment in prisons and jails is predominately poor – and Arizona is no exception. In fact, a class-action suit is currently challenging the adequacy of healthcare in ADC facilities, which has been contracted out to Corizon, a for-profit company. The lawsuit, which remains pending, was filed in March 2012 – two months before Loew aired his news report. See: Parsons v. Ryan, U.S.D.C. (D. Ariz.), Case No. 2:12-cv-00601-PHX-NVW [PLN, July 2013, p.1].

On November 6, 2013, the Arizona chapter of the American Friends Service Committee, a Quaker organization, released a report titled "Death Yards:

Continuing Problems with Arizona's Correctional Health Care." The report cited numerous case studies describing delays in and denials of medical services for prisoners, problems with chronic and infectious disease care, medical staffing shortages and deficiencies in mental health care, among other issues. The AFSC report concluded that inadequate medical treatment in ADC facilities was "the result of policies, organizational culture, and an operating model that prioritizes cutting costs over delivering adequate and timely care."

Which is a far cry from the ample medical services that Loew glibly implied prisoners receive at the expense of non-incarcerated citizens. As of the end of November, almost 80 Arizona state prisoners had died during 2013, mostly due to medical-related causes.

"While prisoners have always written to us complaining of the poor quality of medical care in the Arizona Department of Corrections, there was a noticeable uptick in the number and seriousness of these requests over the past year," said AFSC director Caroline Isaacs.

Study: Risk of Murder, Overdose and Suicide Higher for Recently Released Jail Prisoners in New York City

A STUDY BY RESEARCHERS WITH THE New York City Department of Health and Mental Hygiene (DHMH) supports reforms long urged by prisoner advocates: more mental health and substance abuse treatment, and less incarceration.

After studying over 155,200 people released from New York City jails between 2001 and 2005, the researchers found that former prisoners were twice as likely as other people to die from homicide or a drug overdose. The risks were especially high within the first two weeks after release, with death rates five to eight times greater than non-former prisoners during the same two-week period.

According to the study, which was published in the American Journal of Epidemiology, whites and people who were homeless before going to jail also had an elevated risk of suicide.

The findings, DHMH researchers said, were in line with similar studies in the United Kingdom and Australia, and illustrate the need for more mental health counseling and substance abuse treatment – not only in jails but also for the formerly incarcerated.

“You may not have a job, you may not have an apartment” after being released from jail, said Dr. Josiah D. Rich, the director of Brown University’s Center for Prisoner Health and Human Rights in Providence, Rhode Island. “Your social relationships may be up in the air.”

The stress upon release is sometimes too great for former prisoners, who are more likely to suffer from psychiatric disorders, such as schizophrenia and major depression, than people who have not been incarcerated. Estimates indicate that a significant number of prisoners have mental health issues and most have a drug or alcohol problem.

“The largest mental health facility in New York City is Rikers Island,” Rich said, referring to the city’s largest jail. Yet just a quarter of those held in prisons and only 7% of those in jails receive treatment or counseling during their incarceration.

As a result, former prisoners often revert to self-destructive behaviors to cope with the instability that accompanies freedom. For example, if opiate addicts – users of heroin, as well as oxycodone and hydrocodone – return to their addictions after release, it’s a major problem, Rich said.

“If you start using again at the same levels as before,” he explained, “you’re likely to overdose.”

Of the former prisoners studied by DHMH researchers – all of them over 16 years old who spent at least one night in a New York City jail – 1,149 died following their release sometime during the five-year study period. That number includes 219 drug-related deaths and an equal number of homicides. Released prisoners were, on average, twice as likely to die from drugs or homicide than people who had not served time in jail; there were also 35 suicides during the study period.

Rich said that people who are only in the jail system for a short time can still be helped, given enough resources. “You can sit down with someone and pretty quickly see if they have an opiate addiction,” he noted.

The best way to assist those who serve longer stints in jail, Rich argued, is even more obvious. “The answer,” he said, “is to figure out how we can stop incarcerating so many people.” ■

California Parole Board Agrees to Implement Policy to Fix Terms at Lifers' Initial Hearings

by John E. Dannenberg

ON DECEMBER 16, 2013, THE CALIFORNIA Board of Parole Hearings (Board) and life-sentenced state prisoner Roy Butler entered into a settlement agreement wherein the Board agreed to fix base and adjusted base terms (guidelines for the minimum amount of time that should be served) for all lifers at their initial parole suitability hearings.

Butler, 46, filed a petition for writ of habeas corpus challenging his denial of parole by the Board; he had served 26 years and been denied parole five times. Butler raised two issues in a May 28, 2013 supplemental petition: 1) there was no evidence to support his denial of parole, and 2) the Board should have fixed his base term under the long-standing provisions of the old Indeterminate Sentence Law (ISL) rather than not fixing his term until he is found suitable for parole release.

On appeal, the First District Court of Appeal, Division 2 (1st DCA) took an aggressive stance when reviewing the ISL's continuing viability in requiring the setting of minimum terms for all lifers at the outset of their incarceration, thereby reopening the "proportionality" issue (like time for like crimes) raised in that Court by this writer in 2001, which was approved in part by In re Dannenberg, 102 Cal.App.4th 95 (Cal.App. 1st Dist. 2002), but subsequently overruled by the California Supreme Court. See: In re Dannenberg 34 Cal.4th 1061 (Cal. 2005). The appellate court built upon the concerns expressed by Presiding Justice J. Anthony Kline in his recent concurring and dissenting opinion in In re Morganti, 204 Cal.App.4th 904 (Cal.App. 1st Dist. 2012), thereby reopening the "proportionality" argument.

The 1st DCA also took the unusual preemptive action of bifurcating Butler's petition into two cases – one regarding his denial of parole and the other solely related to the legal question of term-fixing. The Court's reasoning was this: If Butler was granted parole via the first portion of his combined-issue petition, then the second part arguably would become moot. But if the term-fixing matter were separated as a legal issue of statewide importance, it could be resolved irrespective of Butler's individual parole status.

Butler and the Board entered into an agreement that will implement the terms of the settlement relative to term-fixing regardless of the outcome of Butler's challenge to the denial of his parole. In the latter regard, the parties agreed to expedite the appellate court's ruling by waiving oral argument. Further, if Butler prevails in his challenge, the Board agreed to conduct an expedited parole suitability hearing and fix his base term and adjusted base term at that hearing; to order an expedited transcript of the hearing; and to "shorten its internal period of decision review from 120 days to 30 calendar days."

With respect to term-fixing for life-sentenced prisoners, the Board agreed to "announce a policy of calculating the base term and the adjusted base term for all life term inmates at the initial parole consideration hearing," and to promulgate new regulations that ensure terms are fixed for all lifers at their initial parole hearings. For lifers who have already had their initial parole hearings and a term was not fixed, the regulations shall provide that a term will be fixed at their next hearing.

By agreeing to settle, the Board arguably dodged a bullet. The settlement says nothing about "proportionality" or the decision-making process to determine "suitability" for parole. Nonetheless, by having lifers' terms fixed at their initial parole hearings, they could be released after serving less time than under the Board's current procedures – provided they are found suitable prior to their fixed term, net of good conduct credits. Currently, by the time lifers have their base term set by the Board, they have often already exceeded that term.

Specifically as to the new term-fixing policy, the settlement agreement states: 1) as soon as practicable, the Board shall begin implementation of new policies and procedures that will result in the setting of base terms and adjusted base terms for life-sentenced prisoners at their initial parole hearings, or at the next scheduled parole hearing that results in a grant of parole, a denial of parole, a tie vote or a stipulated denial of parole; and 2) the Board will commence rulemaking proceedings designed to memorialize and embody such new policies and procedures within 90 days after the settlement goes into effect.

The settlement provisions related to term-fixing for lifers will not become effective until the Court of Appeal issues a ruling (whether favorable or unfavorable) on Butler's bifurcated challenge to the denial of his parole. Upon such a ruling, "the terms of settlement ... will become effective immediately." See: In re Roy Butler, First District Court of Appeal, Division 2 (CA), Case Nos. A139411 and A137273.

Although the settlement will result in base and adjusted base terms being fixed sooner for life-sentenced prisoners, the Board still must find that they do not pose a danger to public safety and are otherwise eligible before parole is granted.

"We're talking a change that could have a beneficial effect for thousands of inmates who up to now have had no idea when, if ever, they might have a chance for parole," stated Jon Streeter, one of Butler's attorneys.

As a practical matter, the settlement will affect around 35,000 California lifers – about ¼ of the state's prison population. The only lifers not affected are those serving life without parole and those whose initial parole eligibility dates exceed their life spans. The latter category is increasing, and the principal drivers of this increase are that whereas lifers whose older crimes involved the use of a gun only received a two-year sentence enhancement, today they receive an enhancement of a consecutive 25 years to life. Additionally, third-strike cases and multiple sex offenses are now often punished by consecutive life sentences totaling over 100 years. ■

State of Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign is Launching in 2014!

While much progress has been made in reducing the costs of long distance prison calls, we are still fighting to reduce the high costs of in-state prison and jail calls at the local level. Starting in 2014, the Human Rights Defense Center (HRDC), the parent organization of Prison Legal News, will be reopening its Seattle office to launch the Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign.

This is our first statewide phone justice campaign, and we're excited to have people involved on both the local and national levels who are dedicated to ending the exorbitant phone rates and kickbacks associated with the prison phone industry. David Ganim, HRDC's national Prison Phone Justice Director, has already been obtaining the phone contracts and rates for all 39 county jails in Washington, as well as data from the Washington Department of Corrections.

We recently hired a local campaign director, Carrie Wilkinson, who will manage our office in Seattle and coordinate the statewide campaign. Washington prisoners and their families pay some of the highest phone rates in the nation, and we need your help to win this battle!

Here's how you can help – first, please visit the campaign website:

<http://nationinside.org/campaign/campaign-for-washington-prison-phone-justice>

There you can see all the ways you can make a difference. The site allows you to sign up for the campaign and upload videos and share blog entries about how high prison phone rates make it difficult for you to stay in touch with your incarcerated loved ones. You can also upload an audio message, and even call in your story to 1-877-410-4863, toll-free 24 hours a day, seven days a week! We need to hear how you and your family have been affected by high prison phone rates. If you don't have Internet access, you can mail us a letter describing your experiences and we'll post it. Send letters to HRDC's main office at: HRDC, Attn: WA Phone Justice Campaign, P.O. Box 1151, Lake Worth, FL 33460. Washington state prisoners can mail us letters and send a copy of this notice to their family members so they can get involved.

By choosing to participate in the Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign, you will be playing a key role in ending the unfair phone rates that prisoners' families have to pay. We cannot win this battle without your help, so please visit the campaign website and share your experiences! Donations are also welcome and greatly appreciated, and can be mailed to the above address or made online via the campaign site. Thank you for your support!

How Actions by Oklahoma Governor's Staff Led to Weakened State Justice Reforms

by Clifton Adcock, Oklahoma Watch*

BEHIND-THE-SCENES MOVES BY OKLAHOMA Governor Mary Fallin's senior staff members helped lead to a severe weakening of a program designed to cut the state's high incarceration rates and save taxpayers more than $200 million over a decade, according to interviews and records obtained by Oklahoma Watch.

The efforts by the governor's staff, assisted by legislative leaders, to take control of the state's Justice Reinvestment Initiative (JRI) took place during periods when staff members met with representatives of private prison companies, which stood to gain or lose depending on how the initiative was implemented, according to emails and logs of visitors to Fallin's office.

During that time, private prison company representatives also made donations to Governor Fallin's 2014 campaign as well as to legislators, Oklahoma Ethics Commission records indicate.

Steve Mullins, Fallin's general counsel, said private prison groups and lobbyists played no role in the approach that he and other staff members took in regard to the initiative.

"I know for a fact I've never recommended a private prison as a JRI solution, so I know that it wouldn't have influenced anything because it didn't influence my recommendations," Mullins said.

He also pointed out that the Justice Reinvestment Initiative did not die. Several reforms, such as public safety grants, received state funding and have been implemented.

But the JRI's biggest supporters say the program was left in near shambles after the governor's office delayed carrying it out, reversed itself on seeking a federal grant and orchestrated a move to keep former House Speaker Kris Steele, who led the JRI effort, from leading a group overseeing implementation of the initiative.

Steele said he believes a political desire to appear "tough on crime" and pressure from private prison companies ultimately curbed any serious reform efforts.

Throughout the JRI process, Fallin has expressed support for the program and its goals.

The goal of the JRI was to steer nonviolent offenders away from prison, lowering the state's incarceration rates and costs and using the savings to pay for public safety efforts, such as law enforcement grants.

But the planned funding dropped, sentencing alternatives aren't being carried out, fewer pardon and parole officers to monitor offenders were added, and crime-reduction strategy training for local law enforcement agencies didn't occur. The initiative also has no official coordinator.

Renewed focus on the JRI comes after Fallin's office released in late November 2013 – due to media requests – more than 8,000 documents and emails related to the Justice Reinvestment Initiative.

Among the key actions revealed in the emails and visitor logs of the governor's office:

- In January 2013, after failing to get Fallin's preferred candidate named as head of the JRI oversight board, Rebecca Frazier, then Fallin's assistant general counsel, emailed Mullins pointing out that if the state rejected a federal grant for the JRI, the coordinator job wouldn't be funded. Mullins affirmed a "new tack" of rejecting federal funds. Previously, Fallin had supported obtaining the federal grant to fully implement the initiative.

- Fallin's staff played a key role in crafting and pushing legislation that would have done away with the JRI oversight group co-chaired by Steele and Oklahoma County District Attorney David Prater. Steele and Prater resigned from the JRI group in March 2013, expressing frustration at Fallin's office. The legislation ultimately died, leaving no JRI oversight board or coordinator.

- Facing a deadline for bills getting out of committee, Fallin's Chief of Staff Denise Northrup urgently pressed for a vote on the legislation overhauling the oversight group. The email was sent within a few hours after Mullins met with senior officials of private prison company GEO Group. Mullins said the reform initiative was not discussed at the meeting. Northrup was unavailable for comment.

- Five days after Steele's and Prater's resignations, the political action committee for Corrections Corporation of America made a $4,000 donation to Fallin's 2014 campaign, putting the committee at the maximum donation amount. A few days later, a lobbyist who represents the company, among other clients, donated $5,000 to Fallin's campaign. GEO Group had already made donations four days before the session started to 11 legislators, including $5,000 each to House Speaker T.W. Shannon and Senate Appropriations Committee Chair Clark Jolley.

Nothing in the emails and other records reviewed by Oklahoma Watch states that actions taken by the governor's staff or legislators were done at the request of private prison companies. But the documents show private prison companies communicated with the governor's office specifically about the Justice Reinvestment Initiative.

Messages left with Corrections Corporation of America and GEO Group officials were not returned.

Steele said in an interview that the governor's and attorney general's offices were not seriously committed to the JRI reforms. Emails show Mullins and Chief of Staff Northrup wanted Steele off the JRI group once his term as Speaker of the House ended. He left the House because he was term-limited.

Steele said in an interview that he believed the view of the governor's staff was "that I would be gone in a year and the issue would go away. I think ultimately, that's what they were counting on."

Mullins said instead that in pushing the bill, Fallin's office wanted to see the group overseeing implementation of the JRI reformed and codified into state law so that it had statutory authority and political muscle to implement change in the system.

"It wasn't the committee we needed to get the job done," he said.

Reforms Win Approval

ON MAY 10, 2012, GOVERNOR FALLIN signed into law House Bill 3052, or the Justice Reinvestment Initiative.

The signing was the culmination of a more than year-long effort in which Oklahoma sought assistance from the U.S. Department of Justice and the Pew Center on the States to implement a JRI program.

The idea behind the law was to increase the use of sentencing alternatives and other reforms to steer nonviolent offenders away from prison, which would save on prison costs, then reinvest the savings in public safety efforts.

A core JRI oversight group composed of state agency officials and others was to take the next steps, including working with the Council of State Governments to apply for a $400,000 federal grant.

However, "immediately we began to meet with resistance from the governor's office," Steele said recently. "I think as much as anything, it's the fact that Gov. Fallin's staff had convinced her that she had to be a tough-on-crime, lock-'em-up and throw-away-the-key leader."

Steele said Attorney General Scott Pruitt's and Fallin's offices began to "slow-play" cooperation by refusing to communicate with the Council of State Governments or the JRI oversight group for long periods. Deadlines were missed, he said. The council asked the JRI group if the state still wanted grants to fund the initiative. Pruitt's office was unavailable for comment.

In response, Fallin sent a letter to the Council of State Governments in October 2012 saying that the state was still supportive of the JRI.

"It was a way, I think, to appear supportive," Steele said.

Meanwhile, the governor's office was having doubts about the JRI oversight group, according to Mullins.

Initially, Fallin's office did not have a seat on the JRI group, Mullins said, and the group lacked influential legislative players who could help get reform policies enacted.

"Clearly, we thought that the committee was not well-designed to be an execution committee. It was designed to be an evaluation committee," he stated.

Other issues arose. Frazier, deputy general counsel, wrote in an email that Mullins felt the Council of State Governments was trying to control the process too much.

Fallin's office told two key agency heads – then-Department of Corrections Director Justin Jones and Department of Mental Health and Substance Abuse Services Director Terri White – not to attend any of the meetings, Steele and Mullins said.

Mullins explained to Oklahoma Watch: "We're not going to make our directors of programs take time out of their day to sit in a meeting when we don't know what it's about."

Instead, Frazier was sent on their behalf and was to report back to them.

On January 9, 2013, the JRI group voted, 5-1, to name as coordinator an attorney with the law firm Crowe & Dunlevy. Frazier was the only dissenting vote.

Two days after Governor Fallin's choice was rejected, Frazier emailed Mullins pointing out that in order for the coordinator position to be funded by the federal grant, the money would have to pass through a state agency. "If all of the agencies refuse funds, there will be no way to pass through the coordinator funding," Frazier wrote.

Mullins replied, "Maybe we want to take a new tack." He offered this language, in an apparent reference to automatic federal budget cuts: "In light of recent attention to targeted budgeted decisions by the federal government, this is not the time for the State to be requesting federal dollars in an expectation of future partnership commitments.... Therefore, Oklahoma is withdrawing its request for an (sic) JRI implementation grant from the United States Department of Justice."

Mullins said in an interview that after Fallin had provided her letter of support for federal JRI grant money, most state agencies and groups due to receive the money decided they didn't need the funding after all.

Previously, directors of two agencies that would play key roles in the JRI – Jones, of the corrections department, and White, of the mental health department – had expressed support for the reform initiative. They also had repeatedly called for more funding of their agencies.

Private Prison Firms' Interest

BEFORE THE JUSTICE REINVESTMENT Initiative was signed into law in May 2012, private prison companies expressed interest in the program, emails show.

On April 4, 2012, GEO Group lobbyist Brett "Cooper" Robinson sent an email to Frazier and Fallin's policy director, Katie Altshuler, asking them to sit in on a meeting between GEO Group representatives and Northrup.

and other company officials. GEO Group operates the Lawton Correctional Facility and is contracted to operate an empty private prison in Hinton.

"We will be discussing per diems (state payments to private prison operators) and realignment of max prisoners from OSP (Oklahoma State Penitentiary)," Robinson wrote. "Would like to hear your thoughts on JRI and future impact on corrections."

Mullins said any talk about the justice initiative during that meeting would have been forwarded to the Department of Corrections.

Avalon Correctional Services, which operates halfway houses on contract with the state, also expressed interest in the JRI as a way to expand its business.

On April 5, 2012, Avalon President Brian Costello sent Corrections Director Justin Jones a letter about the potential need for intermediate sanction or revocation bed space under the JRI. The letter proposed that the department modify its contract with the company or draft a new contract with Avalon to provide intermediate facility space.

On May 10, the day the JRI was signed into law, Jones replied, declining the offer. Avalon officials did not return calls seeking comment.

By July 2012, staff members for Governor Fallin also were discussing intermediate facilities.

In a July 30 email, Frazier stated that as part of the justice initiative, the Department of Corrections would be moving offenders out of state-run facilities and into GEO Group and Corrections Corporation of America prisons, then using the freed-up space to create intermediate revocation facilities.

Mullins told Oklahoma Watch that the plan to shift prisoners to private prisons under the initiative was proposed by Jones. Jones denies formally proposing such a plan.

Questions of Oversight

IN THE DAYS LEADING UP TO THE JRI group's vote on a coordinator, House Speaker T.W. Shannon filed House Bill 2042, to alter oversight of the JRI.

Shannon's legislation was a "shell bill," meaning it had no legislative text but served as a placeholder in which a lawmaker can later insert language.

Rep. Jason Murphey began drafting text for the bill and became its author. He told Oklahoma Watch that Shannon's staff brought the JRI group to his attention and said changes needed to be made. Shannon's office did not return calls from Oklahoma Watch seeking comment.

Murphey said because the JRI group was not codified in state law, and thus not subject to state regulations such as the Open Meeting Act, it was important to make sure the group had statutory authority.

On February 14, 2013, Frazier sent an email to several Fallin staffers describing Murphey's thinking about a JRI bill. Mullins suggested using the bill to limit a newly proposed JRI board to two years and allow the governor's office to appoint the chair of the board.

Four days later, Rep. Murphey sent proposed language for the bill to House staff and others to codify the JRI board and give the governor the power to appoint the board's chair, and for the House Speaker and Senate President Pro Tem to appoint other members.

"I suspect that was a way they could ultimately get control and get the outcome they wanted," Steele says.

Meanwhile, Mullins, Frazier and Northrup were discussing the federal grant that would have paid for the JRI coordinator position.

On February 21, Frazier sent an email to the liaison for the Council of State Governments and the JRI oversight group, saying the state was turning down the funds.

Steele responded to Frazier, saying he was "stunned" by the decision.

Resignations

THE DEATH KNELL FOR THE JRI GROUP came on March 13, 2013 – one day before the group's scheduled meeting and the deadline for bills to be out of committee.

According to Governor Fallin's visitor sign-in sheet, at 9:25 a.m. that day, GEO Group senior vice president John Hurley, regional vice president Reed Smith and GEO Group lobbyist Tonya Lee met with Mullins in the governor's office.

At 11:56 a.m., Northrup emailed Fallin's legislative director Craig Perry with the subject line of "urgent," asking if she could get information on whether House Bill 2042 had made it out of committee.

About a half-hour later, Northrup sent an email about the bill to policy director Altshuler and Alex Weintz, Fallin's communications director, saying, "We need to know and if I need to make a call to make it move I will..."

The bill made it out of committee and passed the House that night. Fallin's office issued a press release thanking the House and reaffirming her commitment to the JRI.

The next morning, Steele and Prater resigned from the JRI group, saying the governor's office had not taken the initiative seriously and had been dishonest. The JRI oversight group disbanded.

HB 2042 was amended slightly and passed by the Senate, but was never heard in conference committee. Mullins said the governor's staff stopped pushing the bill because they didn't think it had enough support.

Five days after the resignations, on March 19, 2013, Corrections Corporation of America's political action committee provided a $4,000 donation to Governor Fallin's 2014 campaign. Ten days afterward, Fallin's campaign accepted a $5,000 donation from the company's lobbyist, Tammie Kilpatrick.

Mullins denied that the meetings with private prison officials and the campaign contributions played a role in the decisions and actions surrounding the JRI.

Success or Failure?

DESPITE THE CONFLICTS, MULLINS SAID many of the JRI's reforms have been implemented and Governor Fallin's commitment to the Justice Reinvestment Initiative remains strong.

The state mental health department has developed an evaluation tool for judges for alternative sentencing, law enforcement grants are being provided and the corrections department has set up intermediate beds for probation or parole offenders.

But Steele said many of the reforms have not been implemented because they were not adequately funded. Legislative leaders initially agreed in May 2013 to spend $3.5 million, but that amount was reduced. The Council of State Governments had recommended spending $6 million in fiscal year 2013 and $13 million annually beginning in 2014, for a total of $110 million by 2021.

"I do not think the state of Oklahoma can sustain the current trend," Steele said, "either financially or from a human resource standpoint in relation to the way we deal with corrections and nonviolent offenders within our state." ■

Failure to Protect New Jersey Jail Detainee Leads to Drastic Bail Reduction

A NEW JERSEY MAN HELD IN JAIL ON charges of aggravated assault had his bail reduced from $500,000 to $15,000 after a beating by other prisoners left him confined to a wheelchair.

Joshua A. Maldonado, 20, was assaulted in the Cumberland County Jail in November 2012. After the attack it took about an hour and a half to transport him to the jail's infirmary, then over two hours before he was airlifted to a hospital. Maldonado's injuries were so severe that he remained in a coma for six days.

Caroline Turner, Maldonado's attorney, subsequently moved to have his bail reduced. She argued that jail officials had been negligent in not preventing the attack on her client and that, because he was now wheelchair-bound and unable to protect himself, he could be killed if he remained at the jail.

"More than brutally assaulted," said Turner, Maldonado "was nearly murdered and the jail did little to protect him." She stated she was "truly shocked" by the length of time it took jail officials to get her client to a hospital for treatment.

Turner suggested that it would be prudent to reassign Maldonado to another cell so long as he remained in jail, "to prevent any inmates from coming back and finishing the job."

Walter Slachetka, the prosecutor assigned to the case, objected to Turner's bail-reduction request, suggesting that Maldonado was responsible for the beating he had incurred and claiming that, in any event, he was a flight risk.

"It is unfortunate what happened to Mr. Maldonado, but reducing his bail, allowing him to be released, would be a recipe for disaster," said Slachetka, "[T]his was retaliation from an assault that Mr. Maldonado started and because of the landscape of gang activity I suspect [he] is involved in, I fear retaliatory action might be taken."

At a December 2012 hearing, Cumberland County Superior Court Judge James Swift rejected the prosecution's argument and reduced Maldonado's bail to $15,000. "My hope is that no one takes any retribution against him while [he is] out, but I do not feel in his present state he will be roaming the streets in his wheelchair," Judge Swift stated.

Maldonado's family expressed gratitude for the ruling. "Just because someone is in jail does not mean they are not entitled to be treated like a human being," said Maldonado's father.

On August 6, 2013, Maldonado was found guilty of weapons and drug-related charges; he was sentenced the following month to serve up to 9 years in prison. ■

Top Texas Judge Breaks the Law but Gets Special Treatment

SHARON KELLER IS THE PRESIDING judge of the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals – the state’s highest court for criminal cases. In April 2010, Keller was fined $100,000 after it was discovered that she had failed to report a total of $3.8 million in personal earnings and property – not once but twice. On August 19, 2013, following a three-year delay, the fine was reduced to $25,000. [See: PLN, Nov. 2013, p.9].

According to a complaint filed with the Texas Ethics Commission, in 2006 Keller neglected to report from 100 to 499 shares of stock, her interest in eight properties worth $2.4 million, $3,760 in expenses covered under the honorarium exception and $61,500 in personal income.

In 2007, Keller again failed to report the stock, the eight properties (then worth $2.8 million), two honorarium payments valued at $6,010 and nine sources of personal income worth $121,500.

Judge Keller insisted that the omissions were simply unintentional oversights. However, she acknowledged that her actions “constituted violations of her reporting obligations” required by state law.

Keller’s attorney, Joseph Nixon, said that “Judge Keller is very pleased that she was able to reach an agreement with the Ethics Commission to have the matter resolved and have the case dismissed. The settlement is fair for both sides.”

Not everyone agreed.

“We’re disappointed the fine was rolled back by 75 percent,” stated Craig McDonald, executive director of Texans for Public Justice, which had filed the ethics complaint. “We thought the $100,000 fine sent a message to politicians like Keller that they can’t hide assets from the public and their personal financial statements need to be taken seriously.”

Judge Keller is no stranger to controversy. In 2010 she was reprimanded by the State Commission on Judicial Conduct for “willful or persistent misconduct” that “casts public discredit on the judiciary.”

The reprimand stemmed from an incident that occurred on September 25, 2007 when attorneys representing death row prisoner Michael W. Richard asked the court to remain open long enough to receive a last-minute appeal. Keller denied the request with a flippant retort, stating, “We close at 5 p.m.” Richard’s appeal, based on a U.S. Supreme Court ruling that temporarily halted other executions, was not filed in time. He was executed later that night. [See: PLN, Sept. 2010, p.20; Aug. 2009, p.34].

Judge Keller’s reprimand was eventually dismissed by a special court of review which found that the state constitution did not allow such a reprimand as a disciplinary sanction for judicial misconduct – although the state’s legal code does.

On November 5, 2013, Texas voters approved Proposition 9, which the Dallas Morning News said could be called the “Texas Court of Criminal Appeals Presiding Judge Sharon Keller Disciplinary Case Memorial Amendment.” The measure expanded the types of disciplinary sanctions that can be imposed by the State Commission on Judicial Conduct to include various warnings and reprimands. Proposition 9 was approved by a margin of more than 84%. ■

New York Prisoner Awarded Almost $16 Million Due to Poor Medical Treatment

by Christopher Zoukis

IN MARCH 2012, A NEW YORK STATE prisoner was awarded $15.7 million after being left a quadriplegic due to inadequate medical care. The judgment was entered by a New York Court of Claims which found that a prison physician had failed to evaluate or order further tests when prisoner Sergio Black’s symptoms dramatically worsened in a short period of time.

“The Court does not find this was merely an error of medical judgment,” wrote Judge Diane L. Fitzpatrick, “but rather deviation from the standard of care.”

Finding the state “100 percent” responsible for Black’s injuries, the judge awarded damages totaling $15,707,898, including $3.5 million for pain and suffering.

Black’s medical problems developed after he was injured during a basketball game in June 2006 at the Five Points Correctional Facility. At that time, Black told medical personnel he had collided with another player and “couldn’t move for 30-60 seconds.” Having complained of a “back strain” a few weeks earlier, Black wasn’t seen until July 6, 2006. X-rays taken later that month revealed only common “spurring.”

In November 2006, Black fell during another basketball game and was carried to the prison infirmary, where he was held overnight after complaining of numbness and tingling in his leg. A week later he was seen by Dr. Daniel Weinstock, the Facility Health Services Director. On November 20, 2006, Dr. Weinstock received MRI results which indicated Black was suffering from a chronic degenerative disc disease that was likely exacerbated by recent trauma. Actually, Black’s medical condition was causing compression of his spinal column – a serious condition that can result in irreparable injury.

Black was given a cane and returned to his housing unit.

On December 7, 2006, still using a cane, Black met with Dr. Weinstock and complained that he was in pain and felt like he was going to black out. Weinstock prescribed Neurontin, an anticonvulsant, as a pain reliever. According to a neurologist who testified at trial, Neurontin would not have alleviated Black’s pain but “only increased the likelihood [Black] would fall and suffer serious injury” due to the medication’s side effect of causing instability.

Finally, on December 18, 2006, Black fell in his cell and injured his head. The following day he underwent emergency surgery to remove parts of his vertebra, implant steel plates and relieve pressure on his spine. He is now confined to a wheelchair as a quadriplegic, with no feeling from the chest down and severely limited use of his arms. He has no control over his bodily functions and is unable to perform sexually.

In her order awarding the $15.7 million judgment to Black, Judge Fitzpatrick found that Dr. Weinstock’s treatment was “particularly grievous.” Four days before Black’s fall, Weinstock failed to re-evaluate Black’s deteriorating condition and even denied his request for a wheelchair.

Finding that Dr. Weinstock had ignored Black's rapidly worsening symptoms and "put his case on the back burner," Judge Fitzpatrick held Weinstock's treatment – or lack of same – increased the likelihood that Black would suffer injury. The court rejected the state's claim that Dr. Weinstock's malfeasance was "merely an error of judgment," noting that "he prescribed a drug with side effects that can cause clumsiness and uncoordination in a man already unsteady on his feet." Further, delays in sending Black to a neurologist for further evaluation, when Dr. Weinstock was alerted to a serious medical issue, were "solely attributable to [the state's] failure to recognize the urgency and risks of [Black's] condition."

As Black was incarcerated under the custody of the state, he "could not seek a second opinion or pursue other treatment options." Under such circumstances, Judge Fitzpatrick held, significant damages were warranted. Black was represented by the law firm of Franzblau Dratch, PC. See: Black v. State of New York, New York State Court of Claims, Claim No. 115567, UID 2012-018-305.

Following the March 30, 2012 judgment, Black applied for medical or compassionate parole under recently-expanded state eligibility rules, which allowed for early release for certain chronically ill prisoners. However, his application was denied because the parole board found he had "no remorse" for his crime of conviction.

Black was released on regular parole on November 1, 2013 and died four days later. According to one of Black's attorneys, Stephen Dratch, the state has appealed the $15.7 million judgment and the appeal remains pending. Even if the judgment is affirmed on appeal, it will be significantly reduced because the amounts awarded for future medical care and future pain and suffering are no longer applicable due to Black's death.

A search of the online database for the New York State Department of Health's Office of Professional Medical Conduct found that no disciplinary action was taken against Dr. Weinstock for his failure to provide adequate treatment to Black, which resulted in his serious injuries that may have contributed to his eventual death. ■

Study Finds Prisoners Inappropriately Using Topical Antibiotics

by David M. Reutter

RESearch INTO THE USE OF TOPICAL antibiotics in correctional facilities found that prisoners frequently use antibiotics for reasons inconsistent with their recommended purpose.

A two-year study of 822 New York state prisoners was presented at the 39th Annual Educational Conference and International Meeting of the Association for Professionals in Infection Control and Epidemiology (APIC). Of the 421 male and 401 female prisoners in maximum-security facilities who participated in the study, 59% of the men and 40% of the women reported they had used topical antibiotics – ointments such as Bacitracin and Neosporin – within the previous six months.

Those prisoners who had used antibiotics reported using them inappropriately in the following ways: as a lotion for dry skin, 29% of men and 28% of women; as a lip balm, 18% of men and 15% of women; as hair grease, 8% of men and 3% of women; and for shaving, 6% of men.

Misuse of antibiotics can lead to the development of antimicrobial resistance, resulting in multidrug resistant organisms such as methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus aureus (MRSA). Multidrug resistant organisms cause a significant number of serious infections that are more difficult to treat because there are fewer – and in some cases no – antibiotics that will cure them.

“We don’t know specifically whether the overuse of topical antibiotics would lead to MRSA – we don’t have the data to demonstrate that – but in many cases, in general, the overuse and misuse of antibiotics can lead to antibiotic resistance,” said Carolyn Herzig, a Ph.D. candidate at Columbia University in New York City, who led the research team.

“Alternative products, such as lotion and ointments that do not contain antibiotics, are available to inmates, so this comes down to more awareness and better education for this group of people,” she added.

The misuse of topical antibiotics by prisoners is partly linked to policies that restrict the types of hygiene products available in prisons and jails. “Facility medical personnel dispense antibiotic creams and ointments, like foot gels, to inmates on an as needed basis,” said Robin Campbell, a spokesman for the New York City Department of Corrections. “Although inmates may purchase some personal hygiene products, like shampoo, toothpaste and deodorant, from the facility commissary, shaving cream, lip balm and hair gel are prohibited due to security concerns.”

Herzig noted that some prisoners had also reported using topical antibiotics for appropriate reasons, including to treat injuries and for skin conditions such as eczema, certain fungal infections and new tattoos.

“Ms. Herzig’s research highlights the need for education of all audiences about the prudent use of antibiotics, since multidrug resistant organisms pose significant risk to patient safety in many different settings, including correctional facilities,” stated APIC past president Michelle Farber.

The study, which was funded by the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases, concluded that interventions are warranted to reduce the inappropriate use of topical antibiotics among prisoners. ■

Director of Victims’ Rights Group Sent to Prison for Embezzlement

APENNSYLVANIA FEDERAL DISTRICT Court has sentenced a woman to two years in prison for stealing money from a victims’ rights organization she headed.

Between June 2006 and June 2008, Mary Beth Semerod, now 59, stole $205,883.52 from the Rape & Victim Assistance Center in Schuylkill County while she served as the Center’s executive director. Semerod was dismissed from her position in October 2008 and the Center closed in 2009. She reportedly used the embezzled funds to pay department store bills.

A federal grand jury indicted Semerod in October 2010 on a charge of theft from a program that receives federal funding; she pleaded guilty in November 2011 and was sentenced on June 6, 2012.

“There are no good reasons, ever, that can justify” her behavior, Semerod told the court. “I affected the lives of people whom I loved. I am sorry that these actions ... caused these kinds of pain.”

While her attorney sought a non-prison sentence, the prosecutor argued that incarceration was warranted because the crime played a significant role in the closure of the Center.

“This was an embezzlement scheme that happened over the course of a couple years. It was not a single occurrence. It was committed with planning and it was not of limited duration. It was very serious,” said Assistant U.S. Attorney John C. Gurganus, Jr. “There has to be punishment for it. There has to be deterrence. We submit that a sentence of probation would not reflect the seriousness of the offense.”

U.S. District Court Judge Edwin M. Kosik agreed. “What’s right is right and has to be done,” he stated when sentencing Semerod to 24 months in federal prison and two years of supervised release. He also ordered her to pay restitution of $205,883.52.

Semerod is currently in a residential reentry center with a scheduled release date of June 13, 2014. While incarcerated she has been making restitution payments of $25 per month. ■

PLN Challenges Postcard-only Policy at Florida Jail

ON DECEMBER 17, 2013, PRISON LEGAL News filed suit in federal court against St. Lucie County, Florida Sheriff Ken J. Mascara; the lawsuit alleges unconstitutional censorship based on a policy at the county jail that prohibits prisoners from receiving letters, books and magazines. Aside from legal mail, the policy dictates that nothing but postcards will be delivered to prisoners, without notifying the senders about their right to challenge such censorship.

PLN filed suit after dozens of issues of its monthly publication, as well as subscription brochures and books, including a paperback book entitled Protecting Your Health and Safety, were rejected by St. Lucie County jail officials, who failed to provide PLN an opportunity to appeal the rejections.

According to PLN's complaint, pursuant to the jail's mail policy adopted in 2010, "Magazines, paperback or hardcover books (i.e. novels) cannot be received through the mail." Some of the publications, brochures and books sent to prisoners by PLN and rejected by jail staff were returned marked "Postcards Only" and "Return to Sender."

"Most people held in jail are awaiting trial and thus are presumed innocent," observed PLN editor Paul Wright, who also serves as executive director of the Human Rights Defense Center (HRDC). "Government officials cannot constitutionally prohibit prisoners from receiving letters, books and other publications, and cannot constitutionally prevent people outside jail, including publishers, from communicating with those who are incarcerated," he said. "The last time I checked, the First Amendment did not include an exception for St. Lucie County."

"Being able to receive letters, books and magazines is critical to someone who is incarcerated," added Dante Trevisani, an attorney with the Florida Justice Institute, which represents Prison Legal News in the lawsuit.

PLN is seeking declaratory and injunctive relief, as well as nominal and compensatory damages "for the violation of PLN's First and Fourteenth Amendment rights, the failure to deliver PLN's materials, the failure to provide PLN with constitutionally required notice and an opportunity to be heard, the impediment of PLN's ability to disseminate its political message, the frustration of PLN's organizational mission, the diversion of PLN's resources, PLN's loss of potential subscribers and customers, PLN's inability to recruit new subscribers and supporters, PLN's loss of reputation, PLN's printing, handling and mailing costs, costs of staff time, and other damages to be proven at trial," plus attorneys' fees and costs.

Prison Legal News has successfully challenged postcard-only policies and other forms of censorship at jails in other jurisdictions, including in Berkeley County, South Carolina; Fulton County, Georgia; and Shawnee County, Kansas. [See: PLN, Feb. 2012, p.14; Oct. 2011, p.41; June 2010, p.32]. As recently as September 30, 2013, a federal court entered a preliminary injunction in a censorship lawsuit filed by PLN against the Upshur County Jail in Texas, and on April 24, 2013 a federal court in Oregon entered judgment for PLN in a suit challenging a postcard-only policy at the Columbia County Jail. [See: PLN, June 2013, p.42].

The Florida Justice Institute, a public interest law firm, has successfully challenged postcard-only policies in Florida at the Flagler and Santa Rosa County jails [see: PLN, Nov. 2012, p.32], and has prevailed in a number of other First Amendment cases against other county jails and the Florida Department of Corrections.

PLN is represented by attorneys Randall C. Berg, Jr. and Dante P. Trevisani with the Florida Justice Institute, HRDC general counsel Lance Weber and HRDC staff attorney Robert Jack. See: Prison Legal News v. Mascara, U.S.D.C. (S.D. Fla.), Case No. 2:13-cv-14481. ■

Connecticut Guards File Grievances over Efforts to Stem Super Bowl Absenteeism

CONNECTICUT PRISON GUARDS FILED almost 100 grievances over temporary changes in work rules intended to reduce the number of guards calling in sick on Super Bowl XLVI, which pitted the New York Giants against the New England Patriots.

According to then-Department of Correction Commissioner Leo Arnone, requiring guards to produce a doctor's note for a one-day absence successfully reduced the number of Super Bowl absentees to around 100, which is normal for any given day.

In past years, heavy Super Bowl absenteeism had caused the DOC to take extraordinary measures – including paying overtime to cover for absent guards and placing over a third of the state prison system's 16 facilities on full or partial lockdown due to staffing shortages. Either option cost the state extra money.

The guards who filed grievances argued that the new rule related to doctor's orders violated their contract. DOC spokesman Brian Garnett said the department worked with the guards' union and the changes were so successful that only two prisons were placed on lockdown in 2012.

"This was done with the cooperation of the unions, and we tried to work very cooperatively," said Garnett. "This wasn't all a 'stick' approach. There was a 'carrot,' too."

But union officials had a hard time finding the carrot. According to Luke Leone, president of AFSCME Local 1565, which represents about half of the state's 5,000 prison guards, DOC officials requiring a doctor's note for a single day of sick call violated the union's contract, which permits up to four consecutive sick call days before a doctor's note must be produced.

It sounds like the Connecticut prison system treats its guards as it does prisoners – rules are subject to change without notice and do not apply to officials in charge.

As for Superbowl XLVI, the Giants won with a score of 21 to 17. There were no reports of problems regarding Connecticut prison guard absenteeism for Super Bowl XLVII, in which the Baltimore Ravens defeated the San Francisco 49ers, 34-31. ■

Unwanted Reprieve from Execution Upheld by Oregon Supreme Court

by Christopher Zoukis

AS PREVIOUSLY REPORTED IN PLN, Oregon death row prisoner Gary Haugen filed a legal challenge to Governor John Kitzhaber's November 2011 decision to impose a moratorium on the state's death penalty, which had the effect of granting Haugen a temporary reprieve from execution. [See: PLN, June 2013, p.30; Dec. 2012, p.47].

The Oregon Supreme Court held on June 20, 2013 that the reprieve was "valid and effective" irrespective of whether Haugen wanted to accept it. In a 40-page opinion written by Chief Justice Thomas A. Balmer, the Court ruled that a circuit court had erred in finding in favor of Haugen's unprecedented challenge.

When Governor Kitzhaber halted all executions in the state, he said Oregon's capital punishment process had "devolved into an unworkable system that fails to meet the basic standards of justice." Haugen, on death row for the 2007 murder of a fellow prisoner – his second murder conviction – disputed the governor's authority to grant him a temporary reprieve because he did not want to accept it.

Haugen contended that he should be able to choose whether to pursue further appeals or allow his death sentence to be carried out; he further argued the reprieve was invalid because it lacked an expiration date, which left him in limbo, and thus violated the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment.

The Oregon Supreme Court rejected those arguments, concluding "that the Governor's reprieve of Haugen's death sentence is valid and effective, regardless of Haugen's acceptance of that reprieve." See: Haugen v. Kitzhaber, 353 Ore. 715, 306 P.3d 592 (Or. 2013), reconsideration denied.

As a result of the ruling, Governor Kitzhaber's reprieve will last until he leaves office. His term expires next year, and if elected again he would serve until 2019. Haugen's attorney, Harrison Latto, a former state assistant attorney general, said if Kitzhaber is not re-elected the next governor could allow the reprieve to lapse.

In a prior term as governor, Kitzhaber had allowed the execution of two prisoners in 1996 and 1997. When elected again in 2010, he said he was haunted by the executions and would not allow any more prisoners to be put to death while he remained in office. Kitzhaber stated he had no sympathy for Haugen, but cited Oregon's "compromised and inequitable" capital punishment system.

Commutation of a death sentence is permitted under Oregon law, and two previous governors issued blanket commutations to death row prisoners in 1959 and 1964.

For now, Haugen's execution will continue to be delayed. "It could be a day, could be seven years," Latto said. "During that indefinite period, they're saying, 'sit tight and we'll tell you at the end of that period whether you'll be executed or not.'"

Then again, although a delay of unknown duration may be disconcerting, it certainly sounds better than a lethal injection administered sooner rather than later. ■

Shareholder Resolutions Seek to Lower Phone Rates at Private Prisons

ON NOVEMBER 26, 2013, SHAREHOLDER resolutions were filed with Corrections Corporation of America (CCA) and The GEO Group, Inc. – the nation's two largest for-profit prison companies; the resolutions seek to reduce the high cost of phone calls made by prisoners at CCA and GEO facilities nationwide.

Prison phone rates are typically much higher than non-prison rates, and a 15-minute call can cost up to $17.30. Such exorbitant costs make it difficult for prisoners to maintain regular contact with their families and children; an estimated 2.7 million children in the United States have an incarcerated parent.

In September 2013, the Federal Communications Commission issued an order capping the cost of interstate (long distance) prison phone calls. FCC Commissioner Mignon Clyburn observed that "Studies have shown that having meaningful contact beyond prison walls can make a real difference in maintaining community ties, promoting rehabilitation, and reducing recidivism. Making these calls more affordable can facilitate all of these objectives and more." However, the FCC's order has not yet gone into effect and does not apply to in-state prison phone rates. [See: PLN, Dec. 2013, p.1].

Therefore, Alex Friedmann, associate director of the Human Rights Defense

Center (HRDC), PLN's parent non-profit organization, filed shareholder resolutions with CCA and GEO that would require both companies to reduce the cost of all phone calls made by prisoners housed at their for-profit facilities.

HRDC is a co-founder and coordinator of the Campaign for Prison Phone Justice, in conjunction with the Center for Media Justice/Media Action Grassroots Network (MAG-Net) and Working Narratives. The Campaign was instrumental in the FCC's decision to take action against interstate prison phone rates.

The shareholder resolutions request that CCA and GEO not accept "commissions" – kickbacks paid by prison phone companies, usually based on a percentage of revenue generated by prisoners' phone calls. Commission kickbacks correlate with higher prison phone rates, and eight states have banned commissions.

Further, the resolutions ask that the companies "give the greatest consideration to the overall lowest" costs when evaluating or entering into prison phone contracts. The resolution filed with CCA notes that one of the company's facilities, the Silverdale Detention Facility in Chattanooga, Tennessee, receives a 48% kickback and a 15-minute call "can cost as much as $9.75." CCA received $205,136.78 in prison phone commissions at Silverdale in fiscal year 2012 alone. Further, a GEO-operated facility in Florida, the South Bay Correctional Facility, receives a 35% kickback that generated $125,600 in commissions in fiscal year 2012.

"As the largest private prison and detention corporation in the country, CCA has a responsibility to ensure that the families of incarcerated individuals are able to maintain the vital relationships needed in the rehabilitation process," stated Steven Renderos, national organizer for the Center for Media Justice. "For immigrants in detention, a phone call can be the difference between securing adequate legal representation or not being able to see their families again."

If the resolutions receive a majority vote among CCA and GEO shareholders, they will require the companies to ensure their prison phone contracts comply with the terms of the resolutions within 180 days.

In October 2013, CCA vice president Kim White wrote that rehabilitation and reentry programs are a "top priority" for the company. "It is important to us to see inmates grow during their incarceration, offering them the chance at a better life for themselves and their families after their release," she said. "This is part of our responsibility to society as a corrections company, and it's also essential to serving our government partners and taxpayers well."

"This resolution gives CCA an opportunity to prove they are truly interested in rehabilitating prisoners and reducing recidivism," Friedmann stated. "By decreasing the high costs of prison phone calls, the company can promote greater communication between prisoners and their families and children, which research has shown results in improved post-release outcomes and lower rates of recidivism. Or, if CCA is primarily concerned about its profit margin, it will object to the resolution and try to prevent it from going to a shareholder vote."

Should the resolutions survive a challenge filed by CCA or GEO with the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC), they will be presented to the companies' stockholders for a vote sometime in May 2014. Friedmann is represented pro bono by the New York-based law firm of Stroock, Stroock & Lavan. ■

Massachusetts Supreme Court: Failure to Register Guilty Plea Vacated

THE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF Massachusetts held on November 19, 2012 that a sex offender did not violate the state's registration statute and should have been permitted to withdraw his guilty plea after being charged with failure to register.

Massachusetts' sex offender registry law requires level 2 and level 3 sex offenders to initially register in person at their local police department. "In each subsequent year," the offender is required to again register "during the month of birth."

Nicholas B. Loring was classified as a level 2 sex offender. He registered as required on June 20, 2008. When he did not register again during his birth month of September 2008, however, he was charged with failure to register.

Loring pleaded guilty and was sentenced to one year imprisonment and lifetime community parole supervision. He subsequently moved to withdraw his guilty plea but the trial court denied his motion.

The Massachusetts Supreme Court reversed, concluding that "in its ordinary usage, an obligation occurring in a 'subsequent year' means the year following the reference year." Since Loring had initially registered in 2008, he was not required to register again until September 2009 – the subsequent year after he first registered.

"Although the defendant admitted during the plea hearing that he did not register in his birth month (September) in 2008," the Court found that "the statute did not require him to do so. Being under no obligation to register ... in September, 2008, he could not be convicted of the offense of failure to register."

Consequently, because "a court may not convict unless there are sufficient facts on the record to establish each element of the offense," ... the defendant's plea was invalid" and Loring's motion to withdraw his guilty plea should have been granted. ## Tenth Circuit: FRAP 4(b) Clock Commences Upon Entry in Public Docket

THE TENTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS held that a judgment must be entered on a district court's publicly accessible criminal docket to commence the 14-day time limit in which a defendant may file a notice of appeal.

Francisco Mendoza pleaded guilty to federal charges of conspiring to distribute methamphetamine in exchange for the government's agreement to recommend a sentence at the low end of the sentencing guidelines range.

At sentencing, the district court calculated Mendoza's guidelines range as 135 to 168 months. His defense counsel then reminded the court of the government's promise to recommend a sentence at the low end of that range. However, the prosecutor did not honor his promise. Rather, he "emphasized that Mendoza was a 'highest level' drug dealer, possessed firearms, and had been distributing drugs for twenty years."

Regardless, the district court sentenced Mendoza to 135 months in prison at the lowest end of the range. The court then filed a sealed judgment on September 3, 2009. "This filing was not noted or reflected in any way on the docket sheet available to the public. The only evidence in the record that judgment was entered is a supplemental appendix filed by the government which contains a 'Criminal Docket' titled 'Internal Use Only.'"

In June 2010, the district court responded to Mendoza's request for a copy of the docket sheet in his case. Then, on September 13, 2010, he filed a pro se notice of appeal. The government moved to dismiss, arguing that the appeal was untimely under Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure (FRAP) 4(b).

Although Mendoza filed his appeal more than a year after he was sentenced, the Tenth Circuit recognized that under Rule 4(b)(1)(A)(i), "the deadline to appeal begins to run not at sentencing but upon entry of judgment."

The appellate court rejected the government's argument that the "judgment was 'entered on the criminal docket' on September 3, 2009, when the court filed a sealed judgment and noted this filing on a document titled 'Criminal Docket ... Internal Use Only.'"

Interpreting FRAP 4(b), the Court of Appeals concluded "that a judgment is not 'entered on the criminal docket' for purposes of Fed.R.App.P. 4(b)(6) unless judgment is noted on the docket in a publicly accessible manner. This does not mean that a court must provide access to the judgment itself, but the public docket must reflect the date judgment was entered."

Since Mendoza's criminal docket did not reflect the date his judgment had been entered, the appellate court denied the government's motion to dismiss, finding that the "notice of appeal was filed after the court announced its sentence but before the entry of judgment, and thus his appeal is timely."

Turning to the merits of the appeal, the Tenth Circuit agreed that the government had breached its agreement with Mendoza, despite the fact that his defense counsel "did not object to the prosecution's breach of the plea agreement." However, his sentence was affirmed because he was not prejudiced, as the trial court had in fact sentenced him at the low end of the guidelines range. See: United States v. Mendoza, 698 F.3d 1303 (10th Cir. 2012). ■

No Immunity for Detainee's Death Due to Alcohol Withdrawal; $1.23 Million Settlement on Remand

THE SIXTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS held on November 20, 2012 that a Michigan county and two jail guards were not entitled to qualified immunity for a female detainee's death due to severe alcohol withdrawal.

Brenda Sue Smith, 37, was booked into the Lenawee County jail on a parole violation at about 5 p.m. on April 27, 2007. Sergeant Mary Neill, who searched Smith, later telephoned jail medical director Dr. Jeffrey Stickney. "She says she drinks every day, she's an alcoholic," Neill reported. "She's shaking really bad."

Stickney prescribed Librium for alcohol withdrawal, and Smith took the first dose at 9:35 p.m. Later that evening, Sergeant Paul Dye reported that Smith was suffering from "DTs" (delirium tremens).

"I better get some medical attention here because I'm going through withdrawals," Smith told her mother. "I'm already shaking like a leaf."

Two days after being booked into the jail, at 3:30 a.m., Sgt. Dye reported that Smith was exhibiting "paranoid behavior and irrational actions," including singing, pounding on the walls and speaking to relatives who were not present. Other staff witnessed similar behavior.

Jail guard Wendy Vanderpool later testified that Smith was "agitated, talking about things in her life as if she was there and then she was back, you know, in the jail."

Dye moved Smith to a padded observation cell on April 29. He then called Dr. Stickney at 9:26 p.m. to report that she was "to the point of really bad hallucinations right now." He stated that Smith had not eaten lunch, was generally agitated and "getting kind of violent about wanting to get out of her cell."

Stickney assured Dye that "she's on good medicine," and said "sitting in the jail will do her some good." He mentioned he would have the part-time jail nurse examine her the next day.

Smith was so delusional that night that she thought the wall would fall down if she didn't support it, according to Vanderpool's testimony. She was "sweaty from holding the wall up."

By 5 a.m. on April 30, 2007, she was "getting more settled," and was "on the floor playing with puppy dogs and playing with bugs," Vanderpool testified.

Almost four hours later, Smith was on her buttocks and knees with her upper torso resting on the cell's bench. Sergeant James Craig entered the cell, set a cup of water down and left without touching or communicating with her.

Smith's condition was so bad by 9 a.m. that she could not be served with her parole violation notice. She last moved at 9:19 a.m., and was not breathing when guards entered the cell at 9:50 a.m. Paramedics arrived five minutes later and Smith was pronounced dead at a local hospital.

Smith's mother filed suit in federal court against the county and eight jail employees, including Dr. Stickney, alleging deliberate indifference to Brenda's serious medical needs and gross negligence under Michigan law. The district court denied qualified immunity to the defendants, who filed an interlocutory appeal.

The Sixth Circuit reversed the denial of qualified immunity as to Sgt. Dye and three other jail guards. Although it presented "a close question," the Court of Appeals upheld the denial of qualified immunity to Sgt. Craig. Likewise, it was "an extremely close call" for Vanderpool, but because she had worked as a paramedic for 14 years, the Court found that "her exposure to Smith's condition, her experience, and her inadequate monitoring of a detainee whom she knew to be in dire condition are enough to allow the claim of deliberate indifference to go to a jury."

Finally, noting the guards' "admissions that they did not fully grasp the difference between alcohol withdrawal and its more serious analogue, delirium tremens," the appellate court upheld the denial of qualified immunity to Lenawee County. "The record is replete with facts that raise a genuine issue of material fact with respect to the County's policies and practices in providing medical care in its jail," the Sixth Circuit noted. See: Smith v. County of Lenawee, 505 Fed. Appx. 526 (6th Cir. 2012).

Following remand, a $1.23 million settlement was reached with Lenawee County, Sgt. Craig, Vanderpool and Dr. Stickney, which was approved by the district court on September 13, 2013. About $439,010 of the settlement went to pay attorneys' fees and various expenses, with the remainder being placed under the control of a conservator appointed to represent Smith's minor child. See: Smith v. Lenawee

County, U.S.D.C. (E.D. Mich.), Case No. 2:09-cv-10648-DML-MJH. ■

FCC Rate Caps on Prison Phone Calls to Impact Nevada DOC's Budget

by David Ganim

THE RATE CAPS RECENTLY IMPOSED ON interstate (long distance) prison phone calls by the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) signal much-needed financial relief for prisoners and their families; however, they will also leave an estimated $650,000 gap in the 2014 budget for the Nevada Department of Corrections.

Due to the FCC's rate caps, which have not yet gone into effect, the Nevada Board of Prison Commissioners was informed on December 17, 2013 that the state's prison system will no longer be able to charge per-call connection fees for interstate phone calls.

The Associated Press incorrectly reported that the Nevada DOC's interstate phone rates include a $1.00 connection fee; actually, the connection fee for long distance calls from Nevada prisons is $2.50, plus $.49 per minute. The Nevada DOC's intrastate (in-state) phone rates include a $1.00 connection fee plus $.13 per minute – but intrastate calls are not covered by the FCC's order. [See: PLN, Dec. 2013, p.1].

When the rate caps go into effect – which is scheduled for February 13, 2014, although pending litigation may extend that date – prison systems will be allowed to charge a maximum of $.21 per minute for interstate debit and prepaid calls, and $.25 per minute for interstate collect calls.

Nevada prison officials said revenue generated from prisoners' phone calls helps to fund prison programs and services, and that the rate caps would result in a budget shortfall of $650,000. The revenue is generated from a 54.2% commission kickback that the Nevada DOC receives pursuant to its contract with phone service provider CenturyLink.

Prison officials did not explain why revenue from such kickbacks – which mostly comes from price-gouging prisoners' family members through excessively high phone rates – is used to fund prison programs and services in the first place. ■

Religious Diet Qualified Immunity Test Outlined by Seventh Circuit

THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS has held that when determining whether a prison official is entitled to qualified immunity for refusing a prisoner's request for a religious diet, the district court must determine whether the official used the tenets of the religion to deny the request or used those tenets to evaluate whether the prisoner was seeking the diet for personal rather than religious reasons. The case settled following remand in May 2013.

Mondrea Vinning-El, a prisoner at Illinois' Pinckneyville Correctional Center, asked the prison's chaplain, Rick Sutton, for a vegan diet to conform to the tenets of his religion – the Moorish Science Temple of America. Sutton denied the request, observing that the tenets of that religion require a non-pork diet which can include dairy products and many kinds of meat and fish. Contending that his religious beliefs required a vegan diet no matter what other practitioners of the religion believe, Vinning-El filed suit in federal court against Sutton and the prison's warden, John D. Evans, in 2005.

The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted summary judgment on Vinning-El's Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) claim and denied it as to his 42 U.S.C. § 1983 claim. The defendants filed an interlocutory appeal, contending they were entitled to qualified immunity.

After filing suit, Vinning-El was transferred to another prison that provided him with a vegan diet; this mooted his claim for injunctive relief, and his claim for monetary damages was the only relief remaining. Consistent with the Supreme Court's ruling in Sossamon v. Texas, 131 S.Ct. 1651 (2011) [PLN, Aug. 2011, p.22], the Seventh Circuit found RLUIPA does not provide for monetary damages; thus, the defendants prevailed on that claim. Also, Evans was entitled to summary judgment because he could not be held liable under a theory of supervisory liability.

As to Vinning-El's First Amendment claim against Sutton, the appellate court wrote that if Sutton "refused to approve religious diets for inmates who differ on dietary questions from their churches' leaders, he violated clearly established rules of constitutional law."

However, "[a]lthough sincerity rather than orthodoxy is the touchstone, a prison is still entitled to give some considerations to an organization's tenets," the Seventh Circuit held. "For the more a given person's professed beliefs differ from the orthodox beliefs of his faith, the less likely they are to be sincerely held."

The district court had never made a determination on this question, and the case was therefore remanded for a hearing to resolve the issue of qualified immunity relative to Vinning-El's sincerity of religious belief. See: Vinning-El v. Evans, 657 F.3d 591 (7th Cir. 2011).

Following remand the case settled on May 28, 2013 – after eight years of litigation – for a total of $150, with each party to bear their own costs and attorneys' fees. Vinning-El was represented by the Chicago law firm of Kirkland & Ellis, LLP. ■

SC Supreme Court Reverses Furtick; No Liberty Interest in Opportunity to Earn Sentence-Reduction Credits

THE SOUTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT held in late 2012 that the Administrative Law Court (ALC) may not summarily dismiss a prisoner's appeal of a disciplinary conviction "solely on the basis that it involves the loss of the opportunity to earn sentence-related credits. Instead, the ALC must also consider whether the appeal implicates a state-created liberty or property interest."

In June 2008, South Carolina state prisoner Stacy W. Howard was disciplined for providing legal assistance to another prisoner – a violation of "Unauthorized Services/Piddling (845) of SCDC Policy OP-22.14." The violation precluded Howard from earning good-time credits for the month of the infraction and a reduction in earned-work credit for that month and subsequent months. He did not suffer a loss of previously-earned good-time credits.

Howard appealed his disciplinary conviction to the ALC pursuant to Al-Shabazz v. State, 338 S.C. 354, 527 S.E.2d 742 (S.C. 2000). However, eight days prior to Howard's disciplinary violation, the South Carolina Code had been amended to preclude an administrative law judge from hearing prisoner appeals "involving the loss of the opportunity to earn sentence-related credits."

The ALC summarily dismissed Howard's appeal, finding that the amendment had deprived it of jurisdiction and that "the statute applies not only to the loss of the right to earn good time for the month (of the infraction) but to the loss of the right to earn other credits such as earned work credits."

On appeal, the South Carolina Supreme Court reconsidered its decision in Furtick v. South Carolina Department of Corrections, 374 S.C. 334, 649 S.E.2d 35 (S.C. 2007), in which the Court had held that "where a matter clearly implicates a loss of statutory sentence-related credits, the ALC may not summarily dismiss the action." The Court overruled Furtick and adopted the reasoning of the dissent in that case, finding that "the loss of the opportunity to earn sentence-related credits does not implicate a state created liberty interest." However, the Court found that completely eviscerating all judicial review of the loss of earned sentence-related credits due to a disciplinary violation may violate a prisoner's due process rights.

"The ALC may summarily dismiss an inmate appeal that involves only the loss of the opportunity to earn sentence-related credit," the Supreme Court wrote. "However, a matter is reviewable by the ALC where an inmate's appeal also implicates a state-created liberty or property interest, such as the loss of accrued sentence-related credits."

The Court held that the ALC had erred in summarily dismissing Howard's appeal because "it involved more than a review of the loss of the opportunity to earn good-time credits and a reduction in earned-work credits." The ALC could have ruled on Howard's as-applied challenge to the policy, which prohibited him from providing legal assistance to another prisoner.

Nevertheless, the Court found that remand was unnecessary because Howard did not demonstrate any grounds upon which relief could be granted. His challenge to the policy under Johnson v. Avery, 393 U.S. 483 (1969) was misplaced because reasonable alternatives existed to his provision of legal assistance to the other prisoner. He also could not prevail on his court access claim under Bounds v. Smith, 430 U.S. 817 (1977) and Lewis v. Casey, 518 U.S. 343 (1996) [PLN, Aug. 1996, p.1], as he had not suffered actual injury.

"Because there is no particularized right to provide legal assistance to another prisoner under Johnson and there is no derivative right to affirmatively assert a Bounds violation," the Court wrote it could not "discern a legal basis on which [Howard] could be granted relief." Even if he had "a viable Johnson defense to the enforcement of the prison disciplinary policy," he had shown "no cognizable injury as a result of the enforcement." Howard's due process claims also lacked merit, in part because he had admitted to the policy violation.

Accordingly, the ALC's dismissal of his appeal was affirmed. See: Howard v. South Carolina Department of Corrections, 399 S.C. 618, 733 S.E.2d 211 (S.C. 2012).

Federal courts in South Carolina have since used the decision in Howard to dismiss due process claims raised by state prisoners related to the opportunity to earn sentence-reduction credits. For example, on November 5, 2013, the U.S. District Court adopted a magistrate's report and recommendation that certain defendants be dismissed without service of process in a § 1983 suit raising claims concerning a prisoner's placement in a Special Management Unit.

The district court held that "the Magistrate Judge correctly found that under South Carolina law, 'an inmate's loss of the opportunity to earn sentence-related credits does not implicate a state-created liberty interest,'" citing the state Supreme Court's ruling in Howard. See: Abdullah v. Thomas, U.S.D.C. (D. SC), Case No. 2:12-cv-03499 -RMG; 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 159049. █

Multiple Convictions, Single Proceeding Triggers Alaska Lifetime Sex Offender Registration

THE ALASKA SUPREME COURT HAS HELD that the state's lifetime sex offender registration requirement for multiple sex offenses applies to multiple convictions arising from a single criminal proceeding.

The Alaska Sex Offender Registration Act (ASORA), Alaska Stat. § 12.63.020(a)(1)(B), requires a person "convicted of ... two or more sex offenses" to register for life.

In 1995, James D. Ward was convicted, in a single criminal proceeding, of sex offenses involving two children. Following his release from prison he was informed that he was subject to lifetime sex offender registration.

Likewise, in a single 2007 criminal proceeding, defendant Michael E. Boles was convicted of sexual offenses against two children. He also was required to register for life pursuant to ASORA.

Ward and Boles appealed their lifetime registration, arguing "that the pertinent statute, AS 12.63.020(a)(1)(B), is ambiguous, because it can be read to require convictions in more than one proceeding. They therefore reason that the rule of lenity requires that the ambiguity be resolved in their favor and thus that the statute be read to require them to register for 15 years, not life."

Ward's lifetime registration was affirmed by a superior court while Boles' was reversed by a different court. Appeals were taken in both cases.

The Alaska Supreme Court consolidated the appeals and concluded that the rule of lenity did not apply because "The statute, in requiring persons 'convicted of ... two or more sex offenses' to register for life, is unambiguous and cannot reasonably be read to condition lifetime registration on two or more separate convictions for sex offenses, or on any sequential or chronological separation between convictions."

Thus, both Ward and Boles were required to register for life under ASORA. See: Ward v. State, 288 P.3d 94 (Alaska 2012). █

Seventh Circuit Affirms Dismissal of Prisoner's Law Library Access Claim

by Derek Gilna

ILLINOIS STATE PRISONER BRIAN BURD filed a 42 U.S.C. § 1983 complaint for damages in 2010, alleging that officials at the Sheridan Correctional Center had denied him reasonable access to the facility's law library; consequently, he was unable to research and timely file a motion to withdraw his guilty plea or appeal his sentence.

Burd "missed the [30-day] deadline to file his motion, but he continued to seek access to Sheridan's law library. He filled out request slips, but each time he was denied access because the library was closed. When he explained to defendant Gail Sessler, the educational administrator at Sheridan, that he wanted to research a motion to withdraw his guilty plea or an appeal of his sentence, she told him that any such action would be untimely and denied him access to the library."

In affirming the district court's dismissal of Burd's claims, the Seventh Circuit relied upon Heck v. Humphrey, 512 U.S. 477 (1994) [PLN, Sept. 1994, p.12].

According to the appellate court, Heck mandates a "favorable termination requirement," whereby "a favorable determination on the damages claim [under § 1983] necessarily would imply the invalidity of Mr. Burd's conviction and therefore warrant the dismissal of the damages claim as well."

In other words, the Court of Appeals found that "a § 1983 suit for damages that would necessarily imply the invalidity of the fact of an inmate's conviction, or necessarily imply the invalidity of the length of an inmate's sentence, is not cognizable under § 1983 unless and until the inmate obtains favorable termination of a state, or federal habeas, challenge to his conviction or sentence," quoting Heck, 512 U.S. at 487.

Without considering Burd's argument that he had been damaged by deprivation of access to the courts, the Seventh Circuit wrote he "could have sought collateral relief" under federal habeas corpus but "declined the opportunity" to do so, and may not now file a § 1983 action for damages as a means of skirting Heck's favorable termination requirement.

In conclusion, the appellate court joined the Sixth and Ninth Circuits "in holding that Heck bars a § 1983 action where: (1) favorable judgment would necessarily call into question the validity of the underlying conviction or sentence and (2) the plaintiff could have pursued collateral relief but failed to do so in a timely manner."

Accordingly, the district court's judgment of dismissal was affirmed.

Burd petitioned the U.S. Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari, which was denied on June 10, 2013. See: Burd v. Sessler, 702 F.3d 429 (7th Cir. 2012), cert. denied. ■

Oregon: Life Sentence for Murder Unconstitutional During Eight-Month Period in 1999

THE OREGON COURT OF APPEALS HAS held that for crimes committed between February 17, 1999 and October 23, 1999 (aka "the McLain window"), the only permissible sentence for a murder conviction was 300 months in prison followed by lifetime post-release supervision.

From 1995 until February 17, 1999, the statutory punishment for murder in Oregon was life imprisonment with a 300-month minimum under ORS 163.115(5). However, the Oregon Board of Parole and Post-Prison Supervision (Board) had no authority to release an offender who had served the minimum sentence, resulting in a "true life" sentence because there was no possibility of parole.

On February 17, 1999, the Oregon Court of Appeals issued an en banc decision in State v. McLain, 158 Or.App 419, 974 P.2d 727 (Or. Ct. App. 1999), finding that the life imprisonment portion of the sentence for murder was unconstitutionally disproportionate because it resulted in greater punishment than the more serious offense of aggravated murder, which allowed for parole eligibility. As a result, McLain held that "the proper sentence for the defendant's crime of murder was a mandatory determinate sentence of 300 months' imprisonment (25 years) followed by a lifetime of post-prison supervision."

On October 23, 1999, the Oregon legislature corrected the proportionality problem by amending the murder sentencing statute to provide for a 300-month minimum followed by parole eligibility.

The legislature intended that the amendment would apply to any person convicted of murder regardless of when the crime occurred.

Thearone Giles committed a murder on August 26, 1999, during the McLain window, but was convicted on September 20, 2001 – after the 1999 amendment was enacted to resolve the proportionality issue addressed in McLain.

At Giles' April 2010 resentencing hearing, the trial court imposed a sentence of life imprisonment with the possibility of parole following a 300-month minimum, based on the 1999 amendment. Giles appealed, asserting that the "life imprisonment" portion of his sentence violated state and federal ex post facto prohibitions.

The Oregon Court of Appeals agreed, holding that "when defendant committed his offense, ORS 163.115(5) had not yet been amended to correct its disproportionality; thus, ORS 163.115(5) was inapplicable." As such, a 300-month sentence followed by a term of lifetime post-release supervision was the only applicable sentence that Giles could receive.

"Under the amended version of ORS 163.115(5)(a), defendant would be entitled to only the possibility of parole after serving a 300-month minimum. Accordingly, as applied to defendant, the amended version of ORS 163.115(5) would be an ex post facto violation," the appellate court wrote. See: State v. Giles, 254 Ore.App. 345, 293 P.3d 1086 (Or. Ct. App. 2012). ■

Tenth Circuit Orders Foreseeability Jury Determination for Detention by New Mexico DOC Employees

THE TENTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS reversed a district court's ruling that state corrections employees could be held liable only for their own initial 2- to 3-minute detention of two suspects, and not for further detention that occurred after the suspects were transferred to police custody.

New Mexico Corrections Department employees Gary Carson and Don Mangin were patrolling a high-crime neighborhood with Rio Rancho police officers as part of a task force when they observed Phillip Martinez, Ricardo Sarmiento and a third man outside an apartment building.

When the officers turned on their emergency lights, the third man fled and one of the police officers chased after him. Carson and Mangin drew their weapons and forced Martinez and Sarmiento to the ground, then cuffed and searched them.

Still cuffed, Martinez and Sarmiento were transferred to the custody of other Rio Rancho police officers several minutes later. They were arrested, booked and detained; Sarmiento was held for five hours and Martinez for twelve hours.

Martinez and Sarmiento filed a 42 U.S.C. § 1983 suit in federal court against Carson, Mangin and several Rio Rancho defendants, alleging unlawful seizure in violation of the Fourth Amendment.

Denying the parties' cross-motions for summary judgment, the district court "held that the pertinent question for the jury to decide was whether Defendants had reasonable suspicion of criminal activity when they detained Plaintiffs – if so, the brief seizure was warranted as an investigative detention responsive to officer safety concerns; if not, it was an illegal seizure." The court also held that Carson and Mangin "could only be held liable for their own alleged unlawful conduct, not for the actions of the Rio Rancho officers." The Rio Rancho defendants settled before trial for $85,000.

At trial, a federal jury found that Mangin and Carson lacked reasonable suspicion to justify the initial seizure; Martinez and Sarmiento were each awarded $2,500 in compensatory damages and $2,500 in punitive damages. The district court subsequently awarded attorney fees and costs in the total amount of $116,104.54.

On cross-appeals, the Tenth Circuit reversed the district court's order limiting the defendants' liability to only the first few minutes of detention. The appellate court held that a reasonable jury could find the initial illegal detention was a proximate cause of Martinez and Sarmiento's longer detention by Rio Rancho police officers.

"The extent to which Defendants can be held liable for the further detention depends upon what they reasonably foresaw when they transferred Plaintiffs to police custody," the Court of Appeals wrote. "On remand, the district court should conduct a second trial on the limited issue of whether (and to what extent) Defendants should have known their unlawful seizure of Plaintiffs would result in their prolonged detention in Rio Rancho custody and, if so, whether any additional damages are appropriate." The defendants' cross-appeal was dismissed as being untimely filed. See: Martinez v. Carson, 697 F.3d 1252 (10th Cir. 2012).

Following remand, the case settled on January 28, 2013, before the second trial was held. According to Paul Kennedy, one of the attorneys representing Martinez and Sarmiento, the defendants agreed to pay $60,000 in damages and approximately $180,000 in attorney fees and costs. ■

Ninth Circuit: Budgetary Constraints May Excuse Deliberate Indifference to Prisoner's Serious Medical Needs; En Banc Review Granted

ON JANUARY 7, 2013, A DIVIDED Ninth Circuit panel held that a prison employee, alleged to be deliberately indifferent to a prisoner's serious medical needs, can avoid liability for damages by establishing that his inability to provide necessary medical care resulted from a lack of resources over which he had no control.

In a well-reasoned dissent, Circuit Judge Marsha S. Berzon criticized the majority decision on the ground that it could not be reconciled with settled precedent holding that budgetary constraints do not justify constitutionally deficient care or conduct.

While incarcerated at the California State Prison in Lancaster in 2004, Cion A. Peralta sought dental care for cavities, bleeding gums and pain throughout his mouth. Over the course of a year and a half he was seen by a prison dentist, Dr. Sheldon Brooks, three times. Dr. Brooks gave Peralta ibuprofen twice and antibiotics on one occasion; he asked Peralta to identify which tooth hurt the most, X-rayed that tooth and offered to extract it, but never checked for other cavities or infections.

Peralta filed suit pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983, alleging that Dr. Brooks had been deliberately indifferent to his serious dental needs. Brooks presented evidence that the dentist-to-prisoner ratio was inadequate for him to provide proper care for all prisoners, and at trial the jury was instructed that he could not be held responsible for failing to provide services if he lacked the resources to do so.

The jury returned a verdict in favor of Dr. Brooks. Peralta appealed, arguing that regardless of budgetary constraints, Brooks could not be absolved of liability if, despite having actual knowledge of a serious medical need, he failed to provide care responsive to that need.

Ignoring circuit precedent squarely supporting Peralta's position, such as Jones v. Johnson, 781 F.2d 769 (9th Cir. 1986) and Snow v. McDaniel, 681 F.3d 978 (9th Cir. 2012) [PLN, Oct. 2013, p.52], the majority upheld the disputed jury instruction, in effect allowing prison officials to shield themselves from liability, regardless of their personal actions or inactions, by pointing to systemic funding deficiencies.

"We see no reason to impose an injustice upon employees of prison systems in an attempt to avoid injustices to inmates,” the majority wrote. “Nor do we see any reason to drive prison employees out of positions where they can at least try to ameliorate afflictions, even though they have no apotropaion that will effect cures in the absence of sufficient resources.”

In a separate, unpublished ruling also entered on January 7, 2013, the appellate court addressed Peralta’s appeal of the district court’s Fed.R.Civ.P. Rule 50 judgment as a matter of law in favor of Dr. Thaddeus Dillard, the Chief Dental Officer at the California State Prison in Lancaster, and Dr. Junaid Fitter, the facility’s Chief Medical Officer.

The Court of Appeals upheld the district court’s judgment, finding that “a reasonable juror would not have a legally sufficient evidentiary basis to find for Peralta on his claims against Dr. Dillard and Dr. Fitter for deliberate indifference.” Both doctors, who were supervisors, were not directly deliberately indifferent to Peralta’s medical needs, the Court held.

Judge Berzon issued another dissenting opinion in that ruling, based both on the issues raised in the decision concerning Dr. Brooks and also because Dillard and Fitter could have been found liable “regardless of whether they knew of Peralta’s own serious medical needs. They need only be aware that ‘someone in [Peralta’s] situation’ – namely other Lancaster prisoners – had a ‘substantial risk of serious harm’ in the absence of timely care.”

She noted that “These defendants had the authority to make decisions regarding which prisoners were to receive medical treatment when – within the staffing and funding constraints of the prison – but nonetheless rubber stamped the decision to keep Peralta on the routine waiting list.” See: Peralta v. Dillard, 520 Fed.Appx. 494 (9th Cir. 2013).

On June 26, 2013, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals granted en banc review of the panel’s ruling as to Dr. Brooks; the en banc decision remains pending. See: Peralta v. Dillard, 704 F.3d 1124 (9th Cir. 2013), review en banc granted. ■

Washington Defendant Improperly Denied Transcript at State Expense

THE WASHINGTON STATE SUPREME Court held in a November 8, 2012 en banc ruling that an indigent defendant was improperly denied a jury voir dire transcript.

When appealing his convictions for first-degree murder, second-degree murder and two counts of unlawful possession of a firearm, Merle William Harvey requested a jury voir dire transcript at public expense. He needed the transcript to prove his claim that the public was improperly excluded from the courtroom during jury selection. The trial court refused and the Court of Appeals affirmed.

Relying on a relative’s sworn declaration that she had been turned away from the courtroom during voir dire, Harvey briefed the issue in the absence of the transcript. The appellate court rejected his argument, however, finding that it “was not supported by the record provided.” Harvey sought discretionary review, which was granted.

The Washington Supreme Court reversed, stating, “Harvey contends that the trial court erred by closing the courtroom during jury selection. Without a transcript of voir dire, the reviewing court cannot properly consider this claim.” As such, the trial court had “erroneously refused to order that portion of the record transcribed at public expense.”

The Court noted that “It is well established that [t]he State must provide indigent criminal defendants with means of presenting their contentions on appeal which are as good as those available to nonindigent defendants with similar contentions,” pursuant to Draper v. Washington, 372 U.S. 487, 496 (1963).

“Harvey need not make a particularized factual showing to be entitled to transcripts but need only demonstrate a colorable need,” the Supreme Court explained. “He has done so. He is therefore entitled to transcription of the jury voir dire at public expense.” Harvey represented himself pro se. See: Washington v. Harvey, 175 Wn.2d 919, 288 P.3d 1111 (Wash. 2012) (en banc). ■

Oregon: Jury Trials Required When Prosecutors Treat Misdemeanors as Violations

THE OREGON COURT OF APPEALS HELD on September 26, 2012 that criminal defendants are entitled to jury trials and reasonable doubt determinations when misdemeanors are reduced to violations – a ruling that was subsequently affirmed by the state Supreme Court.

Under ORS 161.566(1), Oregon prosecutors may treat most misdemeanors as Class A violations. If they choose to do so, the charge is tried in court without a jury and the prosecution has the burden of proving guilt by a preponderance of the evidence. ORS 151.076(1) and (2). If the defendant is convicted, the court may impose a fine of up to the maximum amount that could have been imposed for the class of misdemeanor that was reduced to a violation. ORS 161.566(2)(b).

Tawanna D. Fuller was charged with two misdemeanor theft offenses stemming from a July 2010 shoplifting incident. When the state elected to prosecute the charges as violations under ORS 161.566(1), Fuller moved for a jury trial and to have her guilt proven beyond a reasonable doubt. The trial court denied the motion and found her guilty of the charges using a preponderance of the evidence standard. Although the court could have imposed a fine of $6,250 on one conviction and $1,250 on the other, it imposed a $600 fine – $300 for each conviction.

The Oregon Court of Appeals reversed, concluding that the trial court had improperly denied Fuller's motion for a jury trial and reasonable doubt determination because treating her misdemeanor charges "as violations pursuant to ORS 161.566 retains too many characteristics of a criminal prosecution to deny defendant the protections of a jury trial and an evidentiary standard of proof of the offenses beyond a reasonable doubt." See: State v. Fuller, 252 Ore.App. 391, 287 P.3d 1263 (Or. Ct. App. 2012).

Prosecutors immediately bemoaned the decision, noting that in an effort to save money, several Oregon counties with strained budgets – including Multnomah, Marion and Lane counties – downgraded many misdemeanor charges to violations.

Clatsop County District Attorney Josh Marquis said the downgrading practice saved staff time and benefited the defendant by eliminating the possibility of a criminal conviction. He suggested, however, that the ruling may negatively impact his county's use of the practice.

"There's no incentive for the district attorneys to reduce [misdemeanor charges] if you're going to have to go to trial with a defense attorney, if you have to use all the same resources," Marquis noted.

The Oregon Supreme Court granted the state's petition for writ of certiorari and affirmed the decision of the appellate court on October 3, 2013. The Supreme Court found "that the legislature may decriminalize minor offenses by enacting a system to prosecute violations, but, in doing so, may not deny an accused the right to a jury trial ... if the proceeding retains attributes of a 'criminal prosecution.'" See: State v. Fuller, 354 Ore. 295, 311 P.3d 861 (Or. 2013). The Court reached the same conclusion in another case decided the same day as its ruling in Fuller, which involved similar issues. See: State v. Benoit, 354 Ore. 302, 311 P.3d 874 (Or. 2013). ■

Ninth Circuit: No Summary Judgment on Claim of Excessive Use of Pepper Spray

ON JANUARY 17, 2013, THE NINTH Circuit Court of Appeals reversed a grant of summary judgment in favor of California prison officials, concluding that the district court had failed to consider the evidence in the light most favorable to the prisoner plaintiff. Given the facts alleged, the appellate court held a rational jury could find that the use of pepper spray to subdue a prisoner who was in a locked cell behind a metal door constituted excessive use of force in violation of the Eighth Amendment.

While confined to a cell at Salinas Valley State Prison where meals were delivered through a 12" x 6" food port, California state prisoner Edward T. Furnace, a practitioner of the Shetaut Neter religion, was authorized to receive vegetarian meals. One morning, when his request for a vegetarian breakfast was denied (and he was given the option of accepting a regular meal instead), Furnace tried to question the guards delivering the breakfast trays. According to his § 1983 complaint, he put his fingertips on the bottom part of the open food port for balance; without a verbal warning, two guards then pepper-sprayed him for "maybe a minute."

Furnace "was struck by pepper spray in the lower part of his face, on his chest, on his stomach, and on his groin area. The pepper spray caused his skin to blister and burn. He experienced a burning sensation for three or four days following the incident. After the incident, he also developed a rash in his groin area that he believes may have been caused by the pepper spray."

The defendant guards moved for summary judgment on grounds of qualified immunity, presenting a different version of events. They claimed that Furnace was told he had ten seconds to remove his hands from the food port; that he was "aggressive" in his refusal to do so; and that he was given only two short blasts of pepper spray. The district court credited the guards' version over Furnace's and granted their motion for summary judgment.

On appeal, the Ninth Circuit concluded that the discrepancy between the two versions of events was too great to be capable of resolution on summary judgment, as there were genuine issues of material fact in dispute. Turning to the question of whether the force used by the guards was "wanton and unnecessary," the appellate court applied the five-factor analysis set forth in Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1 (1992) [PLN, May 1992, p.3].

The Court of Appeals concluded that it was unclear, based on Furnace's version of events, that an application of force was even required; or, if it was, that the amount of pepper spray employed was not excessive. Thus, summary judgment was inappropriate.

The Ninth Circuit also noted that based on Hudson's version, the guards had failed to follow a prison policy (Operation Procedure 29) that requires a verbal warning prior to the discharge of pepper spray. “OP 29 bears directly on the situation that the officers confronted, and is therefore relevant to determining whether the officers could have thought their conduct was reasonable and lawful.” However, the appellate court cautioned “that we do not mean to suggest that any and every deviation from prison policy automatically jeopardizes a correctional officer’s entitlement to qualified immunity.”

The Court of Appeals upheld the district court’s grant of summary judgment on Furnace’s separate equal protection claim, related to the guards’ failure to provide him with a vegetarian breakfast. Accordingly, the lower court’s judgment was reversed in part and affirmed in part. See: Furnace v. Sullivan, 705 F.3d 1021 (9th Cir. 2013).

Following remand, the case settled in June 2013 for $8,000. ■

Hawaii: Incarceration is Good Cause for Failure to Appear; Bail Forfeiture Set Aside

THE HAWAII SUPREME COURT HAS HELD that incarceration constitutes good cause for failing to appear at an arraignment. As such, the trial court abused its discretion in refusing to set aside a bail forfeiture.

Atmarama D. Diaz faced criminal charges in Hawaii and California. He was arrested on a drug charge at Honolulu International Airport in July 2004, posted $1,000 bail and was released. Later that day he traveled to California to face his charges in that jurisdiction.

Diaz was taken into custody in California, where he remained at the time of his August 9, 2004 Hawaii arraignment. The trial court forfeited his bail when he did not appear.

Diaz’s attorney moved to set aside the bail forfeiture, arguing that Diaz’s incarceration in California made it impossible for him to appear for the arraignment in Hawaii. The court denied the motion, finding that Diaz’s incarceration was not “good cause” to set aside the forfeiture. The Intermediate Court of Appeals affirmed.

The Hawaii Supreme Court reversed, however, holding that the trial court had abused its discretion in denying Diaz’s motion because, based on the record before the Court, he “did establish good cause for setting aside” the bail forfeiture under Haw. Rev. Stat. § 804-51 (Supp. 2009), due to his incarceration.

The Supreme Court wrote, “There is no indication in the record that Petitioner [broke] his ... recognizance intentionally, with the design of evading justice, or without a sufficient cause or reasonable excuse.” The case was remanded for further proceedings. See: Hawaii v. Diaz, 128 Haw. 215, 286 P.3d 824 (Haw. 2012). ■

Res Judicata Doesn’t Bar Ohio Post-release Control Challenge

THE OHIO SUPREME COURT HAS HELD that “when a criminal defendant is improperly sentenced to post-release control, res judicata does not bar the defendant from collaterally attacking his conviction for escape due to an earlier post-release-control sentencing error.”

In 1998, Donald Jack Billiter III was convicted of a first-degree felony and sentenced to three years in prison and post-release control of “up to a maximum of three (3) years.” Ohio law actually mandated a post-release control term of five years.

Billiter violated his post-release control and pleaded guilty to escape in 2004. He was initially sentenced to probation, which was later revoked and he was sentenced to six years in prison.

In 2009, the Ohio Supreme Court held in State v. Bloomer, 909 N.E.2d 1254 (Ohio 2009) that an improperly imposed post-release control term cannot be enforced.

In response, Billiter moved to withdraw his guilty plea on the escape charge, on the theory that he had never been legally placed on post-release control. He claimed he was “actually innocent” of escape and was serving a sentence that was a legal nullity.

The Ohio Supreme Court agreed, noting that it had “consistently stated, if a trial court imposes a sentence that is unauthorized by law, the sentence is void.” The Court then rejected the state’s argument that Billiter’s challenge was barred by res judicata, observing that it had held in State v. Fischer, 942 N.E.2d 332 (Ohio 2010)

“that a void post-release-control sentence ‘is not precluded from appellate review by principles of res judicata, and may be reviewed at any time, on direct appeal or collateral attack.’” See: Ohio v. Billiter, 134 Ohio St.3d 103, 980 N.E.2d 960 (Ohio 2012). ■

News in Brief

Alabama: On July 29, 2013 there was a break-in at the Draper Correctional Facility. According to the Department of Corrections, three sections of the prison were burglarized in the early morning hours, and laptop computers and multiple weapons were discovered missing when employees started arriving around 5:00 a.m. The facility's farm office, radio shop and dog kennels, which are located apart from the prison population, were reportedly breached.

Arizona: Newly-hired Maricopa County jail guard Rachel Harris, 22, was attacked on June 24, 2013 by prisoner Bobby Ruiz as she entered his cell at the Lower Buckeye Jail, and during the assault Ruiz bit off part of one of her ears. Two other prisoners rushed to help Harris, pulling Ruiz off her and restraining him until other guards arrived. Sheriff Joe Arpaio told reporters that the missing piece of Harris' ear could not be found and that Ruiz had presumably swallowed it.

Arkansas: Steven Mitchell, 39, died in a crash on July 30, 2013 after leading police on a car chase through the state of Missouri. He had escaped from the Jackson County Detention Center in Arkansas two days earlier with another prisoner. A Nissan Sentra driven by Mitchell's wife, Jessica, with Mitchell as a passenger, was pulled over. When the officer asked Jessica to step out of the car, Mitchell jumped into the driver's seat and sped away. Sheriff David Lucas told ABC News that "During the pursuit, Mitchell wrecked his vehicle and sustained fatal injuries."

Bolivia: According to government officials, about 1,500 young children and adolescents live in Bolivian prisons with incarcerated relatives. The practice, which has been criticized, led to the pregnancy of a 12-year-old girl who was raped by her father, uncle and godfather inside the San Pedro prison in La Paz. In June 2013, prisons director Ramiro Llanos, who had spent part of his childhood living in a jail with his father, called on police to "stop being so corrupt and stop allowing children in prisons."

Florida: On July 24, 2013, Lowell Correctional Institution prisoner Yvonne

Eugene McBride died from what family members were told was pneumonia. The day prior to McBride's death, a mysterious "flu-like" illness was reported among prisoners in R Dorm. The outbreak led officials to restrict the movement of more than 150 prisoners while the undiagnosed sickness was investigated. McBride's sister said she had tried to visit the prison the previous month, and Yvonne told her she was weak and had requested medical help, which was denied.

Florida: Pasco County deputy Norman Grant was arrested on a charge of child abuse on July 5, 2013 after choking and threatening to break the neck of a 16-year-old prisoner. The teenager was strapped in a restraint chair when the incident occurred. Grant has been the subject of three previous internal investigations into excessive force, but was cleared in those incidents due to lack of evidence. This time the incident was caught on video. Grant was fired the same day he was arrested. "This deputy probably should've never worn a badge," said Pasco County Sheriff Chris Nocco.

Florida: Anthony Gentile, a convicted sex offender held at the Manatee County Jail, faces additional charges after he reportedly performed illicit and disgusting acts on food before it was served to a jail employee. Several witnesses described Gentile putting a salad spoon down his pants during the June 2, 2013 incident, then placing the spoon back in the salad, putting his genitals on the salad and spitting on the salad. The staff member reportedly tasted the salad without knowing what had been done to it.

France: Members of the UFAP-UNSa prison guard union gathered to protest in front of more than 100 jails on June 18, 2013. The action by the union, whose members are banned from striking, was to bring attention to overcrowding and safety concerns in French prisons. Protestors set fire to wooden pallets, tires and other objects, and blocked deliveries to the facilities. "This is a shot across the bows, to make the powers be aware of the urgency of the situation," said Union Secretary General Stéphane Barraut.

Hawaii: John Joseph Kalei Hall was sentenced to thirteen months in prison on June 27, 2013 after receiving an estimated $10,000 to $30,000 in one year for smuggling cartons of cigarettes into Halawa Correctional Facility. Federal prosecutors said Hall sold the tobacco to the United Samoan Organization, a prison gang, and tipped them off to contraband searches. U.S. District Court Judge Helen Gillmor said Hall deserved prison time because he promoted criminal activity he was hired to prevent.

Honduras: On August 2, 2013, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights issued a report stating that control at the nation's 24 prisons had "been ceded into the hands of the prisoners themselves.” The next day, Honduras President Porfirio Lobo ordered military troops to take control over the National Penitentiary following a violent disturbance that resulted in three deaths and 15 injuries. Prisons in Honduras are extremely overcrowded and have been cited for poor conditions.

Illinois: Timothy Ware, a 20-year veteran guard at the Decatur Correctional Center, was suspended without pay in June 2013 and charged with eight felony counts of official misconduct. Ware allegedly solicited phone numbers from two female parolees, called them repeatedly to pursue personal or social relationships, and then lied to investigators about obtaining the women’s numbers and the nature of the calls. DOC regulations prohibit employees from socializing with parolees. Ware was released from custody after posting a $2,500 cash bond.

Indiana: Marion County Chief Deputy Eva Talley-Sanders said overcrowding may have played a role in the alleged July 24, 2013 rape of a female prisoner by a male prisoner at the Marion County Jail. A deputy returned the male prisoner to a cell block following a court appearance, unaware that a female prisoner had previously been moved to the same block. The female prisoner claimed she was raped but the male prisoner said they had consensual sex. There was no video of the incident. The deputies involved will likely face disciplinary action.

Libya: Wissam Ismail Smeida, the head of Al-Ruiymi prison in Ain Zara, was assassinated on June 25, 2013; it is thought his killers are linked to prisoners at the facility. A month later the assassination of a prominent political activist triggered protests and a riot broke out inside the al-Kwafiya prison, leading to the escape of more than 1,000 prisoners. The AFP news agency quoted a security official who said there had been unrest at the facility prior to the mass breakout.

Louisiana: Governor Bobby Jindal issued a commutation to prisoner Shelby Arabie on July 12, 2013, reducing Arabie’s life sentence to 45 years and making him immediately eligible for parole. The rare grant of clemency was one of only a few issued by Jindal; Arabie had been recommended for clemency by Louisiana State Penitentiary Warden Burl Cain. Arabie had been sentenced to life in 1984 for shooting and killing Benny Posey, who robbed him during a drug deal. Arabie still must meet the parole board and receive a favorable parole decision before he is released.

Mexico: On August 2, 2013, the Associated Press reported that officials at the Santa Marta Acatitla prison had thwarted an attempt to smuggle a cell phone into the facility in a coffin. Prisoners in Mexico have the right to have the casket of a deceased parent or child delivered to the facility so they can say their farewells. The cell phone was found in the casket of a prisoner’s mother, and city correctional spokesman Emilio Castelazo said criminal charges had been filed.

Mississippi: In three separate incidents that occurred between July 14 and 19, 2013, two guards and the 65-year-old mother of a prisoner were arrested as a result of DOC investigations. Ciarra Harley, a 27-year-old guard at the Central Mississippi Correctional Facility (CMCF), is accused of having a sexual relationship with a probationer. Patricia Bennett-Armstrong, also employed at CMCF, was arrested for possession of prohibited items after a large amount of tobacco was found in her vehicle. Further, Gloria Edwards, the mother of a prisoner serving time at the Mississippi State Penitentiary at Parchman, was arrested for allegedly planning to deliver contraband to a prisoner. Edwards was at the facility to see her son but was arrested before the visit; she had several pills concealed on her body and more drugs were found in her vehicle.

Mississippi: On June 11, 2013, Harrison County jailers Frederick Corso and Joseph Tuten were fired for their roles in the mistreatment of a prisoner and an attempted cover-up of the abuse. A review of surveillance video confirmed the mistreatment, which was witnessed by a third guard who alerted jail administrators. Although the prisoner did not suffer any injuries, Corso and Tuten were terminated when one participated in the abuse and the other falsified incident reports.

Montana: A coroner’s inquest will be held into the shooting death of escaped prisoner Dean Randolph Jess, 42, by a Yellowstone County sheriff’s deputy on July 5, 2013. Jess had been working on a motor vehicle maintenance service call for the Montana State Prison when he escaped.

He stole a Jeep and drove to Billings, where he ended up in a standoff with authorities. Jess was shot by Lt. Shane Skillen when he raised a handgun toward one of the officers surrounding the vehicle. "He may have had it made up in his mind he wasn't going back to prison, one way or another," stated Sheriff Mike Linder.

Nebraska: Just prior to a fatal crash on June 25, 2013, authorities received at least three calls warning that a prison van was speeding and running red lights. The Nebraska Department of Correctional Services van was being driven by prisoner Jeremy Dobbe, 35, who had two DUI convictions; he was assigned to the work release driving job two months before the accident. An NDCS press release stated that prisoners have been allowed to drive other prisoners to work detail sites since 1985. Online court records indicate that Dobbe's drunk driving convictions should have disqualified him from the position. He has since been charged with manslaughter, and the family of Joyce R. Meeks, who died after Dobbe struck her vehicle, has filed a $5 million claim against Dobbe and the State of Nebraska.

and do other odd jobs at the East Kingston Police Department on May 11, 2013. On that particular day there were no other staff at the department after an officer left on patrol. With no supervision for hours, Brisbois allegedly broke into an evidence room and stole heroin, breached an officer's personal locker containing his gun, Taser and handcuffs, and took a police cruiser for a drive. Investigators also suspect that he smuggled some of the heroin and a hypodermic needle back into the jail. Brisbois had been assigned to the police department through a work program at the Rockingham County Jail. The trusty program has since been temporarily suspended.

New York: The wife of a Rikers Island mental health worker was arrested on May 8, 2013 for making death threats to her husband's alleged mistress, another Rikers Island employee. Victoria Beltran, a transsexual actress, suspected an affair after finding unusual credit card charges made by her husband, Brett Bergmann. Furious, Beltran began to pepper the suspected mistress, Katarzyna Sakowicz, with voice-mails and text messages, which Sakowicz reported to authorities. The two women also argued about whether Bergmann knew that Beltran was born a man. Beltran, who was charged with aggravated harassment, said her husband was aware of her sex change operation from the beginning of their relationship. Bergmann is reportedly filing for divorce.

New York: Former Erie County sheriff's deputy Cutolo Buffalo, 54, was charged with pepper spraying a prisoner who was handcuffed and being escorted by two other deputies. The August 2012 incident led to an FBI investigation and Cutolo's termination from the sheriff's department. Cutolo pleaded guilty and was sentenced on August 2, 2013 to six months' home confinement on electronic monitoring plus one year of probation.

New York: Nancy Gonzalez, 29, a former guard at the Metropolitan Detention Center (MDC) in Brooklyn, was impregnated by a prisoner at the jail. Gonzalez was arrested in March 2013 and pleaded guilty on July 3, 2013 to having sex with MDC prisoner Ronell Wilson, resulting in the birth of her son, Justus Liam Gonzalez. Defense attorney Anthony Ricco compared the pair's relationship to that of Romeo and Juliet – although unlike the Shakespearean play, Wilson was facing the death penalty for killing NYPD undercover officers Rodney Andrews and James Nemorin during a gun purchase sting in 2003. Gonzalez refused to testify at Wilson's death penalty hearing and he was sentenced to death on July 24, 2013. She lost her parental rights to Justus on November 15, 2013 after drinking alcohol during meetings with Wilson's relatives,

New Zealand: In July 2013, a New Zealand court ruled against a challenge to the country's ban on tobacco in prisons, holding that the prison system would remain smoke-free. The decision also means that prisoners who have sought compensation for smoking-related offenses will have no recourse. The ban, which was instituted in July 2011, was preceded by an extensive 12-month campaign to encourage prisoners to quit. For many prisoners, giving up smoking has led to better health and cost savings.

North Carolina: A former guard at the Rivers Correctional Institution, Rhonda Boyd, was sentenced on July 11, 2013 to 20 months in prison followed by two years of supervised release for her involvement in accepting payments for smuggling cigarettes into the facility. The investigation was conducted by the U.S. Department of Justice, the Office of Inspector General, the FBI and the U.S. Postal Inspection Service. [See: PLN, Jan. 2013, p.24].

Ohio: A part-time North Royalton jail guard who was serving as a probation officer for the Parma Municipal Court was sentenced to three years in prison on June 17, 2013. Michael A. Maresh, 26, was charged with having non-consensual sex with a woman who was reporting to him as a probationer; he was found guilty of two counts of sexual battery stemming from the June 2012 incident.

Oklahoma: In May 2013, Department of Corrections employees from across the state marched on the Capitol demanding a pay increase. They said it had been seven years since they last received a raise and complained that they deserve better. The governor's communications director, Alex Weintz, said the governor was not comfortable giving the department any additional funding until the manner in which it accounts for those funds becomes more accurate, more transparent or both. "Governor Fallin knows there are many hardworking public servants at DOC, and she respects the work they do," stated Weintz. "Their leadership has not served them well by failing to fully and accurately disclose the agency's finances."

Oklahoma: Darren "Veneno" Padron, 22, is one of six prisoners accused of planning and carrying out the June 13, 2012 stabbing death of fellow prisoner Sonny J. Limpy, 25, at the GEO Group-operated Lawton Correctional Facility. On July 18, 2013, Padron pleaded guilty to his role in the murder and was sentenced to an additional 10 years in prison with five suspended. Also charged were Alonzo "Coon" Florez, Gerardo "Guito" Sanduval, Jose Garcia, Ryan "Frankie" Garcia and Armando Luna. Testimony indicated that the killing was ordered after Limpy refused to join "The 13 Movement," an initiative to unify all Hispanic gangs under one leadership.

Oklahoma: On July 10, 2013, a prisoner at the Tulsa County Jail was found unresponsive during security checks. A nurse who rushed to treat him experienced a sudden cardiac medical emergency and had to be taken to a local hospital. Despite resuscitation efforts by jail staff and the Tulsa Fire Department, prisoner Brian Keith Perry, 41, was pronounced dead. Investigators from the Sheriff's Department ruled out foul play and Perry's death is believed to be a suicide. The nurse was admitted to the hospital for treatment.

Pakistan: On July 29, 2013, militants attacked a prison in northwest Pakistan and reportedly freed more than 250 prisoners. Pakistani Taliban spokesman Shahidullah Shahid claimed responsibility for the assault and said 150 militants took part. Officials had received a letter threatening an attack on the facility, but did not expect one so soon. The militants arrived by car and motorcycle, then began a 4½ hour assault on the prison using bombs, grenades and guns. Some of the attackers, wearing police uniforms, used megaphones to call out the names of specific prisoners. Six police officers, six prisoners and two civilians were killed, including one prisoner who was beheaded.

Pennsylvania: On June 18, 2013, Malik James Hayes, 25, a former York County prisoner, pleaded guilty to involuntary manslaughter for the beating death of Jesus Maldonado-Martinez. The fatal August 21, 2011 incident began as a fistfight after Maldonado-Martinez bumped into Hayes and did not say "excuse me." Hayes' attorney said his client did not mean to kill the victim, and that it was a mutual fight that "got out of hand." Hayes will serve an additional 2½ years in prison for the fatal beating upon completion of his 7½-to-15-year sentence for robbery.

Tennessee: When Brita West arrived at a jail in Scott County to marry Willard Tinch on July 28, 2013, it was apparently a match made in heaven. Tinch was imprisoned at the jail, and West was arrested for trying to smuggle contraband to him. Deputies noticed that West's dentures were falling down and that she had a small package in her mouth, which she apparently planned to pass to Tinch when they kissed following their nuptials. The package contained suboxone and methamphetamine; a search of West's vehicle revealed more meth as well as syringes. She was charged with possession of drugs and drug paraphernalia, and jailed with a $25,000 bond. Presumably there was no honeymoon.

Violence, Security Lapses and Media Attention Lead to Reforms at Georgia Prison

by David Reutter

A SERIES OF INVESTIGATIVE NEWS REPORTS by Chattanooga Times Free Press reporter Joy Lukachick, published from February to December 2013, revealed numerous problems in Georgia's prison system – particularly at Hays State Prison (HSP), located around 40 miles south of Chattanooga, Tennessee – and resulted in lawsuits, security improvements and the replacement of HSP's warden.

While violence has increased in Georgia prisons over the last several years, it was not until four HSP prisoners were murdered within a two-month period that the media began to take notice. Prison officials blamed gangs and contraband cell phones for the spike in violence, but guards faulted their bosses, saying they were more focused on their careers than security.

Since 2010, at least 26 Georgia state prisoners have been slain by other prisoners; four HSP prisoners were killed from December 19, 2012 to February 5, 2013 alone.

Non-fatal assaults on staff and prisoners have been increasing, too. The Georgia State Prison has the highest number of incidents, with 251 prisoner-on-staff assaults in 2012 – an average of 21 per month. Guards have reciprocated the violence, reporting 265 uses of force on prisoners over the same time period. The Georgia Diagnostic and Classification Prison (GDCP) – the state's highest security facility – reported 86 prisoner-on-staff assaults in 2012, the second-highest in the state.

There were signs of trouble in Georgia's prison system before the spate of murders at HSP. At Telfair State Prison, two prisoners were killed between August and October 2012, while six prisoners were murdered over two years of escalating violence at Smith State Prison. Further, two guards were stabbed by HSP prisoner Brian Dukes in February 2012, and guard Larry Stell, 46, was murdered in a dormitory area at Telfair on October 11, 2012.

Conditions became so violence-prone that Georgia Department of Corrections (GDOC) Commissioner Brian Owens changed his number one priority from optimizing bed space in 2012 to "operating safe and secure facilities" in 2013.

"We have never seen violence in GDOC like we've seen in the last 1½ years," observed Sarah Geraghty, a senior attorney with the Atlanta-based Southern Center for Human Rights (SCHR), which called for an independent investigation into violence at HSP. The SCHR also filed suit against the GDOC for violations of the state's Open Records Act, after prison officials demanded over $250,000 to produce documents related to security issues and prisoner deaths at Hays State Prison.

Another prior indicator of systemic problems in Georgia's prison system was a December 9, 2010 peaceful protest and work strike by GDOC prisoners who demanded better food, an end to unpaid labor, improved conditions of confinement and respect for basic human rights. The protest resulted in a violent crackdown by prison staff. [See: PLN, Jan. 2011, p.24].

Shakedowns and Pizza

"THIS NUMBER OF MURDERS CAN BE LINKED directly to inadequate and forewarned shakedowns at Hays State Prison," said an unidentified 30-year veteran guard, referring to the multiple killings at HSP. "Laws were and are being broken by telling inmates to hide their weapons so the tactical squads can't find them. Enough is enough."

Guards use the element of surprise to help them find contraband, which is often secreted in creative hiding places. Policy specifies that shakedowns should be performed at regular intervals but in a pattern prisoners cannot deduce.

The GDOC requires wardens to submit a monthly report documenting the number of weapons, cell phones and drugs found at their facility. "This is your report card. This is how you're judged," one prison official recalled being told at a wardens' meeting. "They don't want to get in trouble. They're looking at their own careers." Thus, there are incentives to minimize the amount of reported contraband.

HSP was declared the GDOC's new "flagship" facility following a June 2011 training session involving Georgia and Tennessee prison officials (former GDOC assistant commissioner Derrick D. Schofield currently serves as the commissioner of Tennessee's prison system). To demonstrate how securely Georgia prisons are run, dozens of guards in body armor swept through HSP in a mass shakedown looking for contraband. Only nine weapons were found during the search of the 1,683-bed facility.

Hays State Prison was named the GDOC's 2011 facility of the year, and the June 2011 shakedown was cited as a factor in HSP receiving that top honor. Guards, however, said the mass search for contraband was a sham.

According to several guards, the night before the shakedown they were ordered by supervisors to go cell to cell, warning prisoners of the upcoming search for weapons and illicit phones. Prisoners were told they would be rewarded with pizza and fried chicken the next day if no contraband was found.

Caleb McGill, manager of a local Little Caesars restaurant, said he received an order for about 400 pizzas to be delivered to HSP the following day; it was the largest order his store had ever received. Soon afterwards, buckets of fried chicken showed up at the facility, too.

"We get pizza if we have a good shakedown," retired Lt. Greg Hall recalled a jubilant prisoner saying. He added, "I spent every day of my life fighting them [prisoners], and then I'm going to give them pizza for being good?"

That was not the first time prisoners at HSP had been forewarned about an impending search. One former guard said prisoners were notified over the facility's loudspeakers in 2010, while others claimed they were told to inform prisoners twice in 2012 and once in 2011.

"[W]arning inmates of upcoming shakedowns places officers' lives in grave danger," said a 20-year veteran guard.

In the spring and summer of 2012, prisoners were told to slide their weapons under the cell doors and guards would collect them, one veteran officer said. Another guard identified HSP Deputy Warden Shay Hatcher as the prison official who gave the order to notify prisoners about searches for contraband.

"That's someone more interested in their job than safety," noted Helen Eigenberg, a criminal justice professor at the University of Tennessee at Chattanooga. "If there's one thing taken seriously in prison, it's weapons."

Staff Shortages and Contraband

HAYS STATE PRISON CAME UNDER INTENSE scrutiny when the news media began questioning prison officials after four prisoners were murdered in less than two months. Derrick Stubbs, 25, was beaten to death at HSP on December 19, 2012; Damion MacClain, 27, was beaten and strangled a week later; 31-year-old Nathaniel Reynolds was murdered on January 18, 2013; and HSP prisoner Pippa Hall-Jackson, 19, was stabbed to death after being transferred to another facility on February 5, 2013. Stubbs and MacClain were in protective custody at the time they were killed.

"It shouldn't have to take a total of four murders for people to say: 'What's going on? Something ain't right in this prison,'" remarked Ken Hall, Hall-Jackson's uncle.

Contraband weapons were clearly an issue with respect to some of the killings, but a shortage of prison staff also was a contributing factor.

GDOC guards were resigning or being fired at a high rate in 2012; more than one-third left their jobs that year. Although HSP is supposed to have 293 guards, 105 quit and 13 were fired during 2012.

"What made me [quit] was seeing the downhill spiral," said one former guard. "When you're seeing things get worse every day, not only seeing nothing done about it but blatantly people telling you to shut up, that's downhill. It's not going to get any better until it gets worse."

By February 2013, HSP's staff shortage reached a peak of 17 percent. On average, the facility had a shortage of 14 percent; staff shortages at other Georgia prisons ran as high as 30 percent. At Telfair State Prison, the shortage of guards ranged from 15 to 20 percent over a three-month period in 2012 when two prisoners and guard Larry Stell were murdered.

To deal with the dearth of staff, Georgia's prison system resorted to overtime:

The GDOC spent $1.1 million in overtime at Telfair alone in 2012. Normally, guards work 170 hours in a 16-day period, but some had 260 hours on their time sheets and were working more than 16 hours a day. Prison officials approved $300,000 in overtime at HSP from April 2012 to January 2013, which meant guards were working more hours and longer shifts.

"People are exhausted, and you don't make the best decisions when you're tired like that," said an HSP guard. "It's unbearable for a lot of folks."

"When you start making budget cuts, you see staffing issues in every department," noted state Rep. Jay Neal. "[The GDOC] works hard to make sure they have adequate staff."

Indeed, a sign posted outside Hays State Prison read: "Hiring Correctional Officers. Entry level $26,754." That was $2,000 more than the GDOC advertised on its website.

Yet people are not flocking to seek employment at HSP despite jobs being scarce in the area, with an unemployment rate of 10.4 percent. As one local blogger wrote, "You, too, can get stabbed with a piece of broken window frame for only 26k a year."

Regular GDOC guards do not carry weapons or flashlights. They have only a set of keys, a radio and a pen. "They have a job that most police officers on the streets wouldn't have," said Joe Stiles, director of the Georgia Police Benevolent Association. He called for a pay raise for prison guards.

To deal with violence and contraband problems at HSP, prison officials sent tactical squads to the facility. Each squad of 12 guards is specially trained and equipped with body armor and riot shields. Their duties included shaking down the prison.

In January 2013, the squads confiscated 192 weapons and 137 cell phones at HSP; they found as many as 25 weapons in a unit housing 62 prisoners. By comparison, 537 weapons and 235 phones were discovered at the facility in all of 2012.

Over 5,000 cell phones and 11,000 weapons were found at the GDOC's 12 high-security prisons in 2012. Smith

State Prison had the most contraband that year, with 866 cell phones and 2,248 weapons seized. In May 2012 alone, guards recovered 101 cell phones thrown over the facility's perimeter fence; that same month, seven visitors were arrested for attempting to smuggle in contraband.

"It's not a mystery what [prison officials] should be doing," said Professor Eigenberg. "When you see spikes in assaults, high levels of contraband, lots of [guard] turnover, those are serious signs of a serious problem."

Faulty Locks and a Lawsuit

CONTRABAND AND STAFF SHORTAGES WERE only some of the issues at Hays State Prison. A 2011 state audit found that locks in prisoner housing units at the facility "could be easily defeated," yet in spite of that warning no action was taken – with fatal results.

Faulty cell door locks contributed to the December 26, 2012 murder of HSP prisoner Damion MacClain, who was beaten and strangled in his cell at night when the doors should have been secured.

"[MacClain's family] should sue the prison," said Daniel Vazquez, a former California prison administrator. "I've worked in corrections all my adult life. I've had officers killed by inmates, inmates killed by other inmates, [but] I have never experienced that."

An electrical engineer and contractor wrote to HSP's engineer in 2010, advising that it would cost about $1,750 to fix the cell doors in each of the prison's 10 units with lock problems, or less than $20,000 total. In the wake of MacClain's murder, GDOC officials promised a "floor to ceiling" review of HSP.

to spend $1 million at HSP stated in part, "Hays State Prison has had recurring problems with the cell door locks in its housing units. This situation has severe security implications in that breaches of the locks have resulted in attacks on inmates and staff." Prison officials also paid $700,000 for a touchscreen locking control system.

Porcelain toilets – which can be broken to create weapons – were replaced with steel versions at HSP. Light switches and air vents were covered to prevent them from being made into improvised shanks. The GDOC also purchased stabproof vests for guards and transferred hundreds of prisoners from HSP to other facilities.

After the Board of Corrections approved a $6.9 million bond issue for statewide prison security improvements in May 2013, the GDOC again presented HSP as a flagship facility, citing lower levels of violence.

"I look forward to Hays being a model for the other similar prisons," said GDOC Board Chairman John Mayes.

"I don't know if there is a perfect system," state Sen. Chuck Hufstetler observed. "But so far they've put their worst prisoners in the newly renovated facility and had no damage to the locks or the beds to the heating system."

Not everyone was satisfied with the belated security improvements, though. Damion MacClain's mother, RaHonda, filed a wrongful death suit in September 2013, claiming prison staff failed to protect her son, who had said he was being targeted by other prisoners because he refused to join a gang. She is represented by the Southern Center for Human Rights.

"Ms. MacClain seeks to hold accountable those state officials who so little valued her son's life that they ignored obvious signs that he and others at Hays were in danger," said SCHR attorney Sarah Geraghty.

The state has filed a motion to dismiss the case, which remains pending. See: MacClain v. Owens, U.S.D.C. (N.D. Ga.), Case No. 4:13-cv-00210-HLM.

Job Security vs. Prison Security

ONE WOULD THINK THAT THE MULTIPLE murders, contraband problems and security deficiencies at Hays State Prison would be detrimental to the careers of the officials in charge of the facility. However, that evidently is not how things work in Georgia's prison system.

HSP warden Clay Tatum was removed from his position on February 6, 2013, the day after Pippa Hall-Jackson was murdered by another Hays prisoner after being transferred to GDCP. Tatum, who was replaced at HSP by Warden Scott Crickmar, was not fired but rather reassigned to Montgomery State Prison – a medium-security facility; he was later transferred to Rogers State Prison. Wardens at 13 other GDOC facilities were shifted to different prisons in June 2013.

HSP Unit Manager Timothy Clark was promoted to chief of security for mobile construction for the entire state, while Deputy Warden Shay Hatcher, who was responsible for security at HSP, was promoted to warden at Rutledge State Prison effective July 1, 2013.

That Hatcher remained in a high-ranking position did not sit well with some prison staff, who blamed him for contributing to violence at HSP by notifying prisoners of shakedowns. "I think it's appalling," said one guard. Both Hatcher and Clark, who are named as defendants in

RaHonda MacClain's wrongful death suit, have a history of misconduct.

Hatcher's record indicates that he was fired in 2000 for sexual harassment, for ordering a prisoner to simulate oral sex with another prisoner and lying to investigators. Four months later he was reinstated, and worked his way up through the ranks.

Clark was involved in an August 12, 2010 incident that began after prisoners attacked several guards. Then a captain, Clark ordered a tactical squad into the unit, shouting, "Give them something they can send pictures to their mommas." Four prisoners suffered retaliatory beatings by members of the tactical squad; they were reportedly punched, stomped, kicked and hit with batons and a flashlight while handcuffed. The prisoners, represented by the Southern Center for Human Rights, filed suit in federal court claiming excessive use of force; the case settled in February 2012 for $93,000. [See: PLN, Sept. 2012, p.24].

According to the Georgia Bureau of Investigation, the nine prisoners murdered in GDOC facilities in 2012 were either gang-affiliated or victims of gang violence. Battling gangs has become harder, according to state officials.

"They used to be able to break up gangs from one prison to another, [but] when you have them communicating through cell phones, it's more and more difficult," said state Rep. Jay Neal.

Atlanta attorney McNeill Stokes has sued the GDOC at least 100 times over the past decade. He said most of the calls he receives from prisoners' family members are about gang-related extortion, assaults and murders. "There are ways to control gang violence," he stated, but prison officials are "just not doing it."

In May 2011, the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals reversed the dismissal of one of Stokes' lawsuits involving the 2006 gang-related killing of prisoner John C. Bradford and an assault on another prisoner, Troy P. Crumbley, at Calhoun State Prison (CSP). The appellate court wrote that there were "hundreds" of weapons in the prison, and almost every inmate in Bradford's dormitory owned or had access to a shank; prison officials refused to discipline inmates for possessing weapons; and gangs, which operated in every dormitory, were extremely violent, stealing, robbing, and committing acts of violence against white inmates in particular. There is also evidence that officials encouraged inmates to obtain weapons for protection, due to the dangerous conditions at CSP."

In reversing the district court's order of dismissal, the Court of Appeals stated: "Our decisions clearly establish that this evidence, at the very least, is sufficient to create a jury question on whether a substantial risk of serious harm existed at CSP." The case was remanded and remains pending, with the district court granting in part and denying in part the defendants' motion for summary judgment on September 30, 2013. See: Bugge v. Roberts, 430 Fed.Appx. 753 (11th Cir. 2011).

Little Accountability

APPARENTLY PRISONERS, NOT GDOC officials, are the only ones being held accountable for the violence and murders in Georgia's prison system. In November 2013, HSP prisoner Devann Michael Anderson, 27, received a 20-year sentence for stabbing Pippa Hall-Jackson to death. Ricardo Beltran-Gonzales, 39, and Leonardo Ramos Rodriques, 36, face murder charges for killing Nathaniel Reynolds at HSP. And Daniel Ferguson has been charged with murdering fellow HSP prisoner Damion MacClain.

Meanwhile, the problems at Hays State Prison continue, including a prolonged limited lockdown, staff shortages – which averaged 17.5 percent from July to November 2013 – and the December 11, 2013 death of prisoner Phillip Pearson, 42. Although the Georgia Bureau of Investigation stated his death may have been a suicide, Pearson's father, Charlie, said his son told him he was in fear of his life, and when he saw his son's body there were bruises on his face. An investigation into Pearson's death remains open.

"The prison won't give us no information," Charlie Pearson stated. "Whatever it is, they need to put a stop to [the violence]. They are somebody's kids. To me that prison needs to be closed down."

From the Editor

by Paul Wright

IN 2011, THE HUMAN RIGHTS DEFENSE Center – the parent organization of Prison Legal News – co-founded the national Campaign for Prison Phone Justice to eliminate the high costs of prison phone calls. We had success before the Federal Communications Commission, which voted in August 2013 to cap the cost of interstate (long distance) prison and jail phone calls. We are now asking the FCC to regulate and cap the cost of intrastate (in-state) calls as well, which constitute around 85% of phone calls made by prisoners.

In January 2014, HRDC launched the Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign (WA PPJ) to end the excessive costs of prison and jail phone calls for Washington prisoners. This is a statewide campaign aimed specifically at Washington state prisons, county jails and the immigration detention center in Tacoma, which seeks to eliminate “commission” kickbacks paid to those facilities to secure monopoly contracts for phone services. We have reopened our Seattle, Washington office for this purpose and the WA PPJ campaign will be led by Carrie Wilkinson. Before joining HRDC, Carrie was a senior litigation paralegal at the Seattle law firm of McDonald, Hogue and Bayless, which represented HRDC and PLN in numerous censorship suits in the Pacific Northwest.

PLN subscribers in Washington have already received an initial mailing from the WA PPJ, and will receive more as the campaign proceeds. We have almost completed the task of gathering all the data for prison and jail phone contracts, rates and commission revenue in Washington state. We need to hear from Washington prisoners and those who accept their phone calls concerning the negative impacts of high prison phone rates. People with Internet access can visit www.wappj.org to upload videos or post comments, or voice messages can be recorded at 1-877-410-4863. If you are a Washington prisoner, please tell your friends and family members about the WA PPJ and how they can get involved. We want to receive personal stories about prison and jail phone rates in Washington state – see the full-page WA PPJ ad in this issue of PLN for more information.

We are excited about launching the Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign as our first statewide campaign to end the practice of price-gouging prisoners and their families, which has gone on far too long. We would also like to welcome Carrie on board as HRDC’s newest staff member. She will be working closely with David Ganim, our national Prison Phone Justice Director, as well as other HRDC staff on the issue of reducing prison and jail phone rates in Washington state.

As longtime readers of PLN know, the only thing I dislike about being editor is noting the passing of our friends and allies. Over the past 23 years this has been the worst part of publishing PLN. On January 1, 2014, Marc Blackman, our longtime attorney in Portland, Oregon, died from complications of kidney cancer. Marc was one of the best criminal defense attorneys in the state and had an abiding passion for fairness and justice.

I first got to know Marc in 1999 when the Oregon DOC was banning PLN due to the type of postage rate we used to mail the magazine. Marc agreed to co-counsel the case with Alison Hardy and we filed PLN v. Cook, which we ultimately won, enjoining the Oregon DOC from censoring PLN based on our postage rates. The DOC attempted to ignore the injunctions in that case and Marc co-counseled with attorney Michael Gendler when we filed another suit, PLN v. Schumacher, to ensure compliance with the prior injunctions. Marc also provided wise and able co-counsel in our recent censorship suits against the Columbia and Umatilla County jails in Oregon, which succeeded in ending jail postcard policies throughout that state.

In February 2013, PLN v. Columbia County went to trial in Portland, Oregon and I spent a lot of time with Marc both in and out of the courtroom, shortly before he was diagnosed with cancer. Marc was an exceptional attorney and over the many years he represented PLN his counsel and tenacious representation was valued and helped lead us to victory in every case. Unlike many successful trial lawyers, Marc did not have a huge ego and was wonderful to work with. He will be sorely missed and both criminal defendants and prisoners in Oregon have lost a dedicated advocate and warrior for their rights. This issue of PLN is dedicated to Marc’s memory, and all the staff at HRDC send our condolences to his friends, family and the law firm of Ransom Blackman LLP.

Enjoy this issue of PLN and please encourage others to subscribe; by subscribing, you help support an independent prisoner media. 🐼

Living in Infamy: Felon Disfranchisement and the History of American Citizenship

Pippa Holloway

Living in Infamy is an outstanding introduction to the complicated racial politics that birthed felon disfranchisement laws and ultimately relegated millions to second-class status in the United States. This meticulous, impeccable history is packed with fresh insights about how we, as a nation, managed to fall so far short of our democratic ideals.” --Michelle Alexander, author of The New Jim Crow

“This is a book that needed to be written. For the first time we now have a comprehensive and sophisticated historical analysis of the racial dynamics of felony disenfranchisement as it evolved in the post-Civil War South. It’s not a pretty picture, but it helps us to understand how we came to a point where U.S. policies in this regard are far out of line with the rest of the democratic world.” --Marc Mauer, The Sentencing Project, author of Race to Incarcerate

States Renewing Their Prison Phone Contracts

As state DOCs renew or rebid their prison phone contracts, you can help urge them to eliminate commission kickbacks and lower intrastate phone rates.

The Campaign for Prison Phone Justice needs your help in ***** Minnesota, New Jersey and Pennsylvania! *******

The Departments of Corrections in the above states are in the process of re-bidding or renewing their prison phone contracts. Most DOCs receive a commission (kickback) on revenue generated from calls made by prisoners, which results in excessively high phone rates. Although the FCC voted in August 2013 to cap the rates of interstate (long distance) prison calls, the order has not gone into effect and does not apply to intrastate (in-state) calls; an estimated 85% of prison phone calls are in-state. This is an opportunity to ask the DOC to forgo commissions and ensure its new prison phone contract is based on the lowest cost to those who pay for the calls – mostly prisoners' families.

Take Action NOW! Here's What YOU Can Do!

Ask your family members and friends to write, email, call and fax the DOC and the governor's office (addresses and contacts are listed below), requesting that the DOC: 1) forgo commission payments when re-bidding or renewing its prison phone contract, and 2) base the new contract on the lowest calling costs. Lower prison phone rates should apply not just to long distance calls but also to in-state calls. For a sample letter or to easily send an email, visit the Campaign for Prison Phone Justice's website and click on the "Take Action" tab:

Prison Phone Justice Campaign: Recent Developments

PLN's DECEMBER 2013 COVER STORY provided an updated look at the prison phone industry and examined a recent order by the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) that imposed rate caps on interstate (long distance) prison and jail phone calls. There have since been several new developments on the prison phone front.

As previously reported, the nation's two largest Inmate Calling Service (ICS) providers, Global Tel*Link and Securus Technologies, filed legal challenges to the FCC's order in the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals.

On January 13, 2014, the appellate court ruled on Securus' motion for a stay of the FCC's order, granting the motion in part and denying it in part. As a result, several key provisions of the order were placed on hold pending the outcome of Securus' lawsuit.

The interim rate caps imposed by the FCC – $.25 per minute for collect interstate ICS calls and $.21 per minute for debit and prepaid interstate ICS calls – were not stayed and went into effect on February 11, 2014. As of that date, all correctional facilities nationwide were required to comply with the rate caps.

In addition to the rate caps for interstate prison phone calls, the D.C. Circuit also declined to stay a provision of the FCC's order related to a prohibition on billing-related call blocking.

However, three other provisions of the FCC's order were stayed by the Court of Appeals: Section 64.6010, which requires that ICS phone rates and ancillary fees be cost-based; Section 64.6020, which establishes safe harbor rates of $.14 per minute for collect interstate calls and $.12 per minute for debit and prepaid interstate calls; and Section 64.6060, which imposes annual reporting requirements on prison phone companies. The appellate court's stay of these provisions will remain in effect until it issues a ruling on the merits of Securus' challenge to the FCC's order.

Following the court's ruling, FCC Chairman Tom Wheeler, Commissioner Mignon Clyburn and Commissioner Jessica Rosenworcel issued a joint statement. "We are pleased that millions of families will finally see relief from outrageous rates for inmate calling services when the interim rate caps ... go into effect in February 2014. These families have been forced to pay exorbitant rates for far too long," they wrote. "Although we are disappointed that the court granted a partial stay on other aspects of the Inmate Calling Services Order, we look forward to a hearing on the merits soon, and to adopting further reforms quickly."

A number of individuals and organizations have moved to intervene in Securus' lawsuit, including the D.C. Prisoners' Project, Citizens United for Rehabilitation of Errants (CURE), the Prison Policy Initiative, United Church of Christ's Office of Communication and the Campaign for Prison Phone Justice. See: Securus v. FCC, D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals, Case No. 13-1280.

Meanwhile, on December 20, 2013, the Human Rights Defense Center (HRDC) – the parent organization of Prison Legal News and co-founder of the Campaign for Prison Phone Justice – submitted a comment concerning the FCC's Further Notice of Proposed Rulemaking on prison phone-related issues. The comment addressed the importance of ICS reforms, the necessity for reform of intrastate (in-state) ICS services, quality of ICS services, ancillary fees charged by ICS providers and inadequate state-level regulation of intrastate prison phone calls.

Further, on January 13, 2014, HRDC filed a reply comment with the FCC to address issues raised by Pay-Tel, an ICS provider that primarily supplies phone services for local jails. Pay-Tel had argued that rate caps on local calls in 7 states required it to offset losses from local ICS calls with revenue generated from interstate ICS calls, and that the FCC's rate caps on interstate calls would force the company to operate at below cost or go out of business. HRDC noted in its reply comment that three of the states cited by Pay-Tel did not, in fact, have statutory or regulatory rate caps on local calls; one state required a rate cap on only certain types of local calls; and the remaining three states had rate caps ranging from $2.25 to $2.70 for a 15-minute local call – which were all "above the safe harbor rates established by the FCC for interstate calls."

Lastly, PLN's December 2013 cover story was accompanied by four charts, including one (Chart D) that listed state-by-state prison phone "commission" kickbacks for 2009 to 2012. The only state with missing data was Maryland, as we had not obtained ICS commission amounts for that state by the time we went to press. The Maryland Department of Public Safety and Correctional Services subsequently provided its prison phone commission data, which included revenue of $5,022,056 in 2009, $5,148,620 in 2010, $5,160,994 in 2011 and $4,958,265 in 2012.

Thus, the total prison phone commissions received by state DOCs nationwide were $140,014,346.39 in 2009, $137,397,425.41 in 2010, $130,697,906.12 in 2011 and $128,296,030.61 in 2012. PLN continues to gather data related to prison phone contracts, rates and commissions, and provides this data to the FCC. ■

Bankruptcy Injunction Covers Pre-petition Incarceration Costs, but Not Those that Accrue Afterwards

THE BANKRUPTCY APPELLATE PANEL for the Eighth Circuit held on February 5, 2013 that a Missouri bankruptcy court was correct in concluding prison officials did not violate a discharge injunction by collecting money from a prisoner's account for incarceration costs that accrued after the injunction was filed.

Missouri prisoner Zachary A. Smith became subject to an $87,830.13 judgment under the Missouri Incarceration Reimbursement Act (MIRA) on January 20, 2009, for the costs of his incarceration through March 26, 2007. The state of Missouri was also granted a judgment for reimbursement costs accruing after March 26, 2007 through Smith's release from prison – which is unlikely since he is serving life without the possibility of parole. The judgment further allowed the state to collect 90% of all deposits to Smith's prison account, excluding wages and bonuses earned while incarcerated.

Smith filed a Chapter 7 bankruptcy petition on September 14, 2010 and received his discharge on March 11, 2011. In September 2012, the state seized a $45.00 deposit to Smith's prison account pursuant to the MIRA judgment. He then filed a motion for contempt with the bankruptcy court, claiming the state had violated the discharge injunction. The bankruptcy court agreed that the MIRA judgment was void with respect to all costs accrued as of the bankruptcy filing, but held the judgment remained valid as to future reimbursement costs and that the costs incurred by the state since Smith's bankruptcy petition were not dischargeable debts.

On appeal, the state agreed the MIRA judgment was void as to pre-bankruptcy petition debt, and the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel upheld the lower court's determination that reimbursement costs incurred after the discharge injunction remained valid. Thus, there was no Supremacy Clause violation. The appellate court also rejected Smith's argument that the $45.00 was protected because it came from his mother's Social Security benefits. Not only was the issue fruitless because it was raised for the first time on appeal, but such benefits "are no longer protected when the recipient chooses to pay or give away those funds." The bankruptcy court's judgment was therefore affirmed. See: Smith v. Missouri, 488 B.R. 101 (B.A.P. 8th Cir. 2013), rehearing denied.

Smith appealed to the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals, citing a recent Missouri state court appellate decision that held a judgment under MIRA permits reimbursement only from assets to which a prisoner has a present legal right. See: State ex rel. Koster v. Cowin, 390 S.W.3d 239 (Mo. Ct. App. 2013).

The Court of Appeals affirmed the decision of the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel on September 25, 2013, citing the Rooker-Feldman doctrine – which prohibits lower federal courts from exercising appellate review of state-court judgments – and finding no violation of the Supremacy Clause. See: Smith v. Missouri, 530 Fed.Appx. 616 (8th Cir. 2013). ■

What Are the Odds of Complete Reversal After Conviction in the Second Circuit?

by Richard Levitt and Peter Schmidt

A POTENTIAL CLIENT ASKS AN ATTORNEY the odds of completely overturning his federal trial conviction on appeal. If the attorney is experienced in the ways of appellate advocacy and his predilection for candor trumps his predilection for solvency, he might tell his potential client, “Statistically, not great. Beyond that, it depends on how serious the case is, the issues we raise and the judges assigned to hear your appeal.”

But, you wonder, what really are the odds of winning an appeal after trial in the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit? We wondered that too, so we decided to find out. First we looked at published statistics to see if we could avoid doing the heavy lifting ourselves. The closest we came to an answer was on the uscours.gov website, which includes Table B-5, titled “U.S. Courts of Appeals – Appeals – Terminated on the Merits, by Circuit, During the 12-Month Period Ending September 30, 2012.”<sup>1</sup>

This table reflects an overall nationwide reversal rate in criminal appeals of 7 percent, and a reversal rate in the Second Circuit of 9.2 percent, but does not distinguish between appeals following trial and appeals following entry of a guilty plea, not to mention appeals from other criminal proceedings such as those involving bail or supervised release. Nor is it clear what is meant by a “reversal,” as some appeals from criminal convictions result in reversal of certain counts but not others. So we did our own digging.

We started by reviewing nearly 6,000 decisions (both published and unpublished) involving criminal law issues that were decided by the Second Circuit between January 1, 2000 and May 31, 2013. We then eliminated all cases in which the defendant(s) pleaded guilty; all habeas decisions; all decisions that solely addressed pretrial motions, such as bail and motions to suppress; and all decisions relating to issues such as revocation of supervised release and similar collateral matters.

We were left with a list of 1,985 cases involving direct appeals from trial convictions in the Second Circuit between January 1, 2000 and May 31, 2013.<sup>2</sup> It is often said that defendants are entitled to a fair trial, not a perfect trial,<sup>3</sup> and so the percentage of complete reversals<sup>4</sup> should reflect the percentage of cases in which appellate judges determined that the defendant did not receive a fundamentally fair trial. If the judges are guided by this rule, then it follows that they collectively believe that more than 96 percent of trials are fundamentally fair; our research reveals that over the 13 years we examined, the rate of complete reversals was approximately 3.78 percent.

Now, that’s the average. Year by year the results vary significantly, and range from lows of 1.51 percent and 1.57 percent in 2003 and 2005, to highs of 6.75 percent in 2005 and 2012. These are enlightening statistics but they don’t tell the whole story. Attorney Roy Cohn famously said, “Don’t tell me what the law is, tell me who the judge is.” Cohn, of course, was referring to trial level judges and to a slightly different phenomenon than what is typically encountered at the appellate level, but it is no less – and possibly more – true when it comes to appeals, where a judge’s philosophy of appellate review of criminal convictions may trump all other predictors of success when close issues are presented.

Reversal Rates

AND SO WE WENT BEYOND A MACRO review of appellate dispositions and examined the reversal rates of every Second Circuit judge on every panel for all 1,985 cases that fell within the survey period. The results were eye-opening. Reversal rates of current Second Circuit judges who sat on at least 50 panels reviewing convictions after trial ranged from 0 percent, .8 percent and 1.6 percent (Judges Lynch, Livingston and Raggi), to 6.6 percent, 7.7 percent and 8.8 percent (Judges Jacobs, Calabresi and Parker). That’s quite a difference. If you draw a panel of judges with the lowest reversal rates, your odds of prevailing, even with an arguably meritorious issue, are vanishingly small. Draw a panel of judges with the highest reversal rates and your chances increase almost ten-fold.

When these statistics were further parsed, we found a substantial disparity between judges with respect to who authors the reversals. For example, Judge Guido Calabresi, who has a high reversal rate, authored only three of the 22 reversals in which he participated during our survey period. Judge Barrington Parker, Jr. wrote seven of his 21 reversals. Judge Rosemary Pooler voted to reverse 14 times and authored nine of those reversals. Chief Judge Dennis Jacobs authored nine reversals. The late Judge Roger Miner voted to reverse only three times while sitting on 158 panels, yet wrote each such opinion. Judge Reena Raggi, by contrast, voted to reverse four times during our survey period but wrote none of those reversals. Judge Robert Katzmann voted to reverse nine times, but authored only one of those decisions. Of the 75 complete reversals during our survey period, 66 were signed decisions, one was a per curiam decision and eight were summary orders.

Reversal Rates - Sitting Judges

Four judges – Winter, Parker, Pooler and Jacobs – accounted for 30 of the 66 signed reversals during the 13-year survey period. The varying rates of opinion writing may also have skewed perceptions regarding which judges are most likely to vote to reverse. For example, Pooler authored eight reversals and Judge Joseph McLaughlin only three, but in fact Pooler's reversal rate is 4.6 percent and McLaughlin's is 6.3 percent. This seeming anomaly is explained by Pooler having authored nine of the 14 reversals in which she participated out of a total of 307 panels, whereas McLaughlin authored only three of the 10 reversals in which he participated out of a total of 159 panels. The reversal rates for sitting judges who were part of at least 50 panels that reviewed convictions after trial on direct appeal, between January 1, 2000 and May 31, 2013, are set forth in the table accompanying this article.

on the Second Circuit, sat on 236 panels considering appeals from federal criminal convictions during our survey period. On nine occasions she voted with the majority to reverse – a middling reversal rate of 3.8 percent; she authored two of those opinions.<sup>5</sup>

And what about judges sitting on the circuit by designation? Of the 74 judges who sat by designation during our survey period, Judge Jed Rakoff of the Southern District of New York stands out. He sat on 71 panels reviewing convictions, voted to reverse six times and authored one of those reversals, resulting in a reversal rate of approximately 8.5 percent, which exceeds that of all active Second Circuit judges except Parker.

Judge or Law?

A PRINCIPAL IMPETUS FOR THE U.S. Sentencing Guidelines was concern over sentencing disparity at the district court level. But what of disparity in the determination of appeals brought in the circuit courts? The results of our survey strongly suggest that an appellant's odds of winning a complete reversal in a close case brought in the Second Circuit are largely determined by which three-judge panel hears the appeal. By any yardstick this seems random and unfair.

Perhaps this disparity could be mitigated through liberal use of en banc review, but the Second Circuit rarely convenes en banc to consider criminal appeals.

And so the next time a defendant in a criminal case asks whether he has a shot at winning a complete reversal of his conviction in the Second Circuit, his attorney can say, "I'll let you know when the panel assignments are published." ■

This article was originally published by the New York Law Journal in July 2013; it is reprinted with permission, with minor edits. The original article included a chronological list of every complete reversal by the Second Circuit during the survey period.*

The Effects of Private Prison Confinement in Minnesota on Offender Recidivism

THE MINNESOTA DEPARTMENT OF Corrections (DOC) recently completed an evaluation of the effects of private prison confinement on offender recidivism. The evaluation assessed the impact of confinement at the Prairie Correctional Facility (PCF) in Appleton, Minnesota on recidivism among 3,532 offenders released between 2007 and 2009. The average follow-up period for the offenders in this study was 2.5 years.

Key Findings

- Private prison confinement was associated with a greater risk of recidivism in all 20 Cox regression models that were estimated. This association was statistically significant in 8 of the 20 models.

- All five private prison measures examined in this study significantly increased the risk of reconviction.

- Three private prison measures significantly increased the risk of rearrest.

- None of the private prison variables had an impact on either reincarceration measure (new offense and technical violation revocation).

- The findings suggest that the PCF produced slightly worse recidivism outcomes among the healthiest and best-behaved prisoners for the same amount of money. The recidivism results may be due to fewer visitation and rehabilitative programming opportunities for offenders confined at PCF.

Prior to 2010, when prison population growth created shortages in prison beds at state facilities, the DOC frequently housed some of its prisoners at the PCF. The facility, which opened in 1996, once held as many as 1,200 Minnesota state prisoners. Operated by Corrections Corporation of America (CCA), a private prison company, the PCF closed in February 2010 due, in part, to slowed growth in Minnesota's prison population, which minimized the need to transfer offenders to non-DOC facilities.

The evaluation examined whether private prison confinement had an impact on recidivism among prisoners released from Minnesota prisons between 2007 and 2009. Of the 9,535 offenders incarcerated in DOC facilities and released to the community during the 2007-2009 period, 1,766 (19 percent) spent at least a portion of their confinement at the PCF. Due to eligibility criteria offenders had to meet in order to be transferred to the PCF, propensity score matching was used to individually match the 1,766 offenders who spent time in the PCF with 1,766 offenders from the comparison group pool of 7,769 prisoners who spent their entire confinement period in state correctional facilities.

Private prison confinement was measured five different ways in this study, and Cox regression analyses were used to determine whether confinement at the PCF had an impact on recidivism.

Recidivism Results

THE DATA IN FIGURE 1 SHOW THAT OFFENDERS confined at the PCF had higher recidivism rates than the offenders in the comparison group. For example, 47 percent of the offenders in the private prison group had been rearrested for a new offense by the end of December 2010 compared with 41 percent of the comparison group offenders. The results also show that 31 percent of the private prison offenders were reconvicted for a new offense compared to 26 percent in the comparison group. In addition, 14 percent of the private prison offenders were reincarcerated for a new criminal offense compared to 13 percent of the comparison group offenders. Lastly, compared to the offenders in the comparison group, who had a technical violation revocation rate of 31 percent, those in the private prison group had a rate of 33 percent.

Twenty Cox regression models were estimated that assessed the impact of private prison confinement, which was measured five different ways, on the four recidivism measures. The results from the multivariate statistical analyses, which controlled for time at risk and other rival causal factors, revealed that private prison incarceration was associated with a greater risk of recidivism in all 20 Cox regression models that were estimated. This association was statistically significant, however, in only 8 of the 20 models.

While the findings suggest that time spent at the PCF did not have a beneficial impact on recidivism outcomes, it should be emphasized that the PCF confinement did not significantly increase risk consistently across all recidivism measures examined. Moreover, the magnitude of increased recidivism risk was relatively modest (13 percent for rearrest and 22 percent for reconviction) in the models that analyzed any private prison exposure.

finement in private prisons does not lead to improved recidivism outcomes. Likewise, this study found that private prisons are not more effective in reducing recidivism, which may be attributable to fewer visitation and rehabilitative programming opportunities for offenders incarcerated at private facilities.

The results from this evaluation suggest that private prisons can offer correctional agencies a valuable resource – prison bed space – during periods of sharp population growth. The value of this resource declines, however, if bed space is available in state-operated facilities. More specifically, the evidence from this evaluation and prior studies indicates that private prisons are not a superior alternative to state-run prisons. The findings from this study suggest, if anything, that private prisons produce slightly worse recidivism outcomes among the healthiest and best-behaved prisoners for the same amount of money. ■

Confronting Prison Slave Labor Camps and Other Myths

by James Kilgore

THERE ARE MOMENTS WHEN OUR longings for social justice cloud our vision, times when the way we want the world to be blocks our understanding of the way things really are. A good example of this is the notion of the United States' prison system as totally driven by profit-hungry corporations that ruthlessly advance their bottom lines on the backs of the exploited.

This myth contains a modicum of truth: of course, the 1 percent and beyond do make money off of locking people up. Corporations like Kitchell Construction have done very well building more than 110,000 prison "beds." At roughly $100,000 each, that comes to about $11 billion, which is pretty serious money. Despite the fields of money that have been reaped from the prison and jail boom, this economic aspect of prisons has spawned some myths that often get in the way of effectively opposing mass incarceration.

The first of these is the idea that private prison corporations are the main culprits. A wide spectrum of campaigns has focused on these corporate targets. Activists have opposed private prisons' attempts to colonize new territory, blocking immigration detention center proposals in Illinois, halting a bill to privatize the entire prison system of the state of New Hampshire and driving the GEO Group "brand" off the face of the football stadium at Florida Atlantic University.

These are inspiring victories and such struggles will continue. However, we also need to keep the bigger picture in mind: private prisons are not the heart of the beast. In reality, at least for the moment, they are bit players. Among them, they only control about 8 percent of prison beds in the system nationwide. They are more important in certain states (e.g., Texas, New Mexico) and are also a primary force in the key current growth area for incarceration – immigration detention centers, where they own and/or operate about half the immigration detention beds.

But if we follow the money, we find that the total revenue for the two largest prison providers, Corrections Corporation of America (CCA) and the GEO Group, came to a little over three billion dollars in 2012. That is less than half the state corrections budget for California. The real villains in the world of the incarceration game remain the state prison systems.

While economics is more than incidental in the expansion of prisons, mass incarceration remains a politically-driven project that has built a huge popular base of support. Politicians have played the "law and order" card and fear of crime card, and the middle classes across the country have responded, often supporting the construction of more carceral institutions at the expense of education and other social services. Although there is a special immorality about making profit from caging people, especially given the disproportionate incarceration of African Americans and Latinos, it is no less morally bankrupt to spend taxpayers' money for prisons and jails at the expense of jettisoning the country's social welfare system and self-identity as a caring society.

Moreover, even though tales of abuse in private prisons abound, the state and federal prison systems have given us the supermaxes and Special (or Security) Housing Units (SHUs), where people live in torturous total isolation for years on end. Florence ADX, Pelican Bay SHU and the isolation units in Angola, Louisiana are all government-operated institutions. In fact, the privates try to stay away from the "hard cases," preferring to focus on cherry-picking people with nonviolent convictions and no major medical problems. Recruiting low cost "clients" helps the bottom line. So let us remember to confront the political powers that be, including some cherished icons in the Democratic Party, with at least as much venom as the private corrections companies when we carry out our campaigns.

The second convenient myth of the prison system is that it is nothing more than a string of slave labor camps where hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of people work under contract to major corporations for meager wages. Late last year, researchers Stephen Fraser and Joshua B. Freeman released a study which claimed that “penitentiaries have become a niche market for such work. The privatization of prisons in recent years has meant the creation of a small army of workers too coerced and right-less to complain.”

Their perspective has resonated with a number of news services, anti-mass incarceration bloggers and activists. For example, a report from Russian news service RT claimed that prisons are “becoming America’s own Chinese-style manufacturing line.” Huffington Post picked up the story, quoting Fraser and Freeman: “All told, nearly a million prisoners are now making office furniture, working in call centers, fabricating body armor, taking hotel reservations, working in slaughterhouses, or manufacturing textiles, shoes, and clothing, while getting paid somewhere between 93 cents and $4.73 per day.”

Fraser and Freeman went on to name a number of companies like Chevron, Bank of America, AT&T and IBM that allegedly are making superprofits from cheap prison labor. I spent six and a half years in federal and state prison systems, and this analysis has little relation to reality. Modern-day prisons are warehouses. People suffer and die in prison from the total lack of stimulus and activity. My recollections of prison yards are of hundreds of men trying to pump some meaning into their lives with maniacal exercise routines, obsessive cleaning of their living quarters or absolute devotion to religious practice. Many also organized hustles – sports betting pools, making arts and crafts or writing legal briefs to make a few extra bucks for a jar of coffee or a few candy bars from the commissary. Some, though a distinct minority, found a way to focus on intellectual growth. But working in a corporate sweatshop was not on our radar.

The statistics on this bear me out. Virtually all private-sector prison labor is regulated under the Prison Industries Enhancement Certification Program (PIECP). Any prison that publicly markets goods worth more than $10,000 must register with PIECP. PIECP’s first-quarter report for 2012 showed 4,675 incarcerated people employed in prison or jail PIECP programs. This represents about 0.25 percent of the 2.3 million people behind bars in U.S. prisons and jails.

Likely the largest single user of contract prison labor is Federal Prison Industries, which handles such arrangements for the Bureau of Prisons (BOP). Of the nearly 220,000 people held in BOP facilities, just 13,369 – representing approximately 8 percent of work-eligible “inmates” – were employed as of September 30, 2012. However, the overwhelming majority of this production was under contracts with government agencies such as the Departments of Defense and Homeland Security, not private corporations.

There is an economic logic to why so few corporations use prison labor, despite the low wages and apparent rigid control over the workforce. Prisons are first and foremost about security. Production takes a back seat when there is violence on a yard, especially if it is directed at staff. A security situation may lock down a prison for days, weeks or even months. No production deadlines are going to get in the way of security. Given that reality, along with the excessively bureaucratic nature of corrections institutions, sweatshops in the global South look like a much better bet for corporate profit margins. The claim by Vicky Pelaez in Global Research in 2013 that “thanks to prison labor, the United States is once again an attractive location for investment in work that was designed for Third World labor markets” is totally off the mark.

Such misconceptions about the connection between incarceration and labor do more than merely distort the facts. They also draw our attention away from the central labor issues underlying the growth of the prison population. Prison expansion is a by-product of the immiseration of urban neighborhoods, especially those that are largely African American. This deindustrialization has robbed these communities of jobs and the neoliberal restructuring of the state has stripped away the institutions of social welfare.

Instead, money has poured into security and narrowly defined “public safety” – fighting a failed War on Drugs and beefing up local police departments through federal grants that equip small-town law enforcement as if they are in the middle of a war zone. Even my own small county of Champaign in central Illinois has found the resources to purchase a drone, while mental health facilities continue to close down.

The negative impact of incarceration on this displaced and discarded urban workforce continues even once they have completed their sentences. People with felony convictions cannot get food stamps in many states, or qualify for TANF. Many local housing authorities bar people with drug convictions, often evicting the family of those returning from prison if they house their loved ones post-release.

The job market is hostile territory as well for those with a felony. Though a “Ban the Box” movement has scored victories in 10 states and over 40 counties and cities, most employment applications still contain the question about criminal background. For those of us with felony convictions, that question equates with an instant closing of the door of opportunity.

Then there are all the occupations and professions with certification processes that bar or restrict people with felonies. For example, a study by the Mayor of Chicago’s office found that of 98 Illinois state statutes dealing with professional licensing, 57 contained restrictions for applicants with a criminal history. Even some people applying for licenses to become barbers or cosmetologists faced legal impediments.

People who have been involved in opposing mass incarceration often refer to the entire system as the prison industrial complex, or PIC. Certainly, the prison sector constitutes an industry. But as the term PIC implies, the relationships between the political and economic forces at work in this process are complex. Though it is convenient to focus on corporations as the main drivers of the grandest social policy debacle of the last three decades, mass incarceration will only be reversed when we effectively contest its political agenda. That agenda is founded on the idea of criminalizing the poor and building on the fear of the rising presence of people of color in this country.

As Ruthie Gilmore and Michelle Alexander have pointed out, it is part of a broader political backlash against the “welfare state” and the social movements of the 1960s and 1970s, especially the Black liberation struggle. We do need to stop the CCAs and the GEO Groups to fundamentally change the criminal justice system in the United States, but, more important, we need to dislodge the mindset and the political leaders who have built popular support for a “lock ‘em up and throw away the key” ideology. ■

Ninth Circuit: 9-Year Detention Pending Civil Commitment Proceeding Warrants Habeas Relief

IN MARCH 2013, THE NINTH CIRCUIT Court of Appeals reversed a district court's dismissal of a pro se habeas petitioner's claim that his 9-year detention while waiting for the State of California to initiate civil commitment proceedings was unconstitutional.

Just before convicted rapist Bobby Joe Knight's scheduled release from prison in 2004 after serving a 20-year sentence, the state filed a civil petition against him under California's Sexually Violent Predator Act (SVPA), Cal. Welf. & Inst. Code §§ 6600, et seq. The Los Angeles County Superior Court ordered that Knight be held in a secure facility pending trial.

Knight remained in custody, as no effort was made to bring the state's petition against him to trial. Incredibly, between 2004 and 2009, Knight's counsel requested (or stipulated to) continuances of the case. Not content with the quality of his representation – being deprived of one's liberty indefinitely, without due process of law, can be frustrating – Knight repeatedly requested that he be appointed new counsel.

Exasperated, he filed a habeas corpus petition in state court in April 2009, claiming that his lengthy detention was unconstitutional. The petition was denied, and Knight's counsel and the government agreed to still more continuances.

In December 2009, Knight filed for habeas relief in federal court. [PLN readers should note that Knight's habeas petition was brought under 28 U.S.C. § 2241 and thus not subject to the demanding restrictions of AEDPA]. The district court dismissed the petition, concluding that because Knight was challenging ongoing state civil commitment proceedings, it could refuse to hear his case under the doctrine of abstention espoused by the Supreme Court in Younger v. Harris, 401 U.S. 37 (1971).

The Ninth Circuit reversed, holding that Knight's SVPA civil commitment proceedings were not ongoing, and thus Younger abstention did not apply. "Knight's SVPA petition proceedings were not 'ongoing,' except in name only, when he filed his federal habeas petition," the Court of Appeals wrote.

The case was remanded to the district court with instructions to issue a conditional writ of habeas corpus requiring the state to try Knight within 90 days or release him and dismiss the SVPA petition. See: Knight v. Ahlin, 709 F.3d 1296 (9th Cir. 2013).

However, while motions for rehearing and rehearing en banc were pending following the Ninth Circuit's decision, the parties filed a joint motion to dismiss. Accordingly, the appellate court dismissed Knight's appeal, vacated its original decision and remanded the case with instructions to dismiss. The earlier ruling can not be cited as precedent. See: Knight v. Ahlin, 714 F.3d 1117 (9th Cir. 2013). ■

Possession of Rape Video Warrants Restitution; Victim Awarded Over $1 Million Thus Far; Supreme Court Grants Cert.

WHEN SHE WAS A LITTLE GIRL, AMY'S uncle videotaped himself raping her, then shared the video with other pedophiles. Now in her 20s, Amy (a pseudonym) is seeking restitution from everyone who has ever possessed and viewed the pornographic images of her. The extent to which she is entitled to restitution is now before the Supreme Court.

Years ago, when Amy was 8 years old, a pedophile asked her uncle to rape her and videotape the assault, according to government documents. Her uncle sexually abused her, was convicted and sentenced to prison. Amy collected a few thousand dollars in restitution from her uncle.

She initially healed from the abuse, but "drastically deteriorated" when she learned, years later, that images of her rape were being widely collected and traded by other pedophiles online.

Amy suffers ongoing trauma because she is constantly revictimized but is powerless to stop it, her lawyer stated. She developed emotional and psychological problems; for example, she bit her nails until they bled, abused alcohol and could not finish college.

On average, every day Amy's attorney is notified of at least one new case involving images of her rape. So far he has been notified of over 1,500 cases and estimates that at least 10,000 pedophiles have possessed the images.

"A reasonable estimate of the total number of persons who will collect Amy's image over the course of her lifetime is 100,000," her restitution petition alleges.

Since 2008, University of Utah law professor Paul Cassell and New York attorney James R. Marsh have filed hundreds of restitution requests on Amy's behalf, under 18 U.S.C. § 2259. Each request seeks approximately $3.3 million, though the awards are typically much smaller than that amount. Amy has been awarded more than $1 million in restitution thus far, according to Cassell.

Once she has recovered enough money to cover her losses, Amy will stop seeking restitution, Cassell said. Yet he noted that the ubiquitous pornographic images of her rape will likely never be completely eliminated, given the nature of the Internet.

Courts have disagreed about victims' right to restitution in cases like Amy's. "We're talking about an area of the law that just plainly is not settled," said Meghan Ryan, an assistant law professor at Southern Methodist University.

While some courts have awarded Amy the requested restitution, others have refused without a showing of "proximate cause" – a direct connection – between the harm she suffered and the pedophile's possession of images of her.

For example, Texas resident Doyle Randall Paroline pleaded guilty to federal charges of possessing child pornography, including two images of Amy's rape. After he was sentenced to two years in prison, federal prosecutors moved for full restitution for Amy. Paroline's attorney, Stanley Schneider, while acknowledging that Amy was "horribly abused," argued she was not entitled to restitution because she had not shown a direct connection between the harm she suffered and Paroline's possession of images of her abuse. The district court agreed, finding it could not determine how much of her loss was directly caused by Paroline, and denied Amy's restitution request.

The government reversed course on appeal and joined Paroline's argument that the victim must show "proximate cause" to obtain restitution. The U.S. Department of Justice's position was "that we need to be able to prove proximate cause of the harm," said Camille Sparks, an Assistant U.S. Attorney for the Northern District of Texas and coordinator of Project Safe Childhood. "It's not an impossible burden," she noted,

"but it's a hard burden."

On October 1, 2012, the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, in an en banc decision, rejected the arguments of Paroline and the Department of Justice, concluding that it is unnecessary to show a direct connection between the victim's harm and the possession of images of that harm. See: Paroline v. Amy Unknown, 697 F.3d 306 (5th Cir. 2012).

However, the Court of Appeals subsequently granted a petition for rehearing en banc, consolidated Paroline's case with an appeal raising similar issues in a Louisiana federal prosecution, and issued another decision on November 19, 2012 that vacated its prior ruling.

Amy's attorney had argued that as a matter of grammatical construction, the "proximate cause" requirement of § 2259(b)(3)(F) was only applicable to "any other losses suffered by the victim" and not to the enumerated categories of losses specified in § 2259, such as medical and mental health care, lost income and attorneys' fees.

Parsing the language of the statute, the Fifth Circuit agreed, holding "that § 2259 only imposes a proximate result requirement in § 2259(b)(3)(F); it does not require the Government to show proximate cause to trigger a defendant's restitution obligations for the categories" of enumerated losses in § 2259(b)(3)(A) through (E).

"Accordingly, we hold that § 2259 requires a district court to engage in a two-step inquiry to award restitution where it determines that § 2259 applies. First, the district court must determine whether a person seeking restitution is a crime victim under § 2259.... Second, the district court must ascertain the full amount of the victim's losses as defined under § 2259(b)(3)(A)-(F), limiting only § 2259(b)(3)(F) ["any other losses"] by the proximate result language contained in that subsection...."

The Court of Appeals concluded, "we reject the approach of our sister circuits and hold that § 2259 imposes no generalized proximate cause requirement before a child pornography victim may recover restitution from a defendant possessing images of her abuse." Accordingly, the district court's judgment in Paroline's case was vacated and remanded. See: In re: Amy Unknown, 701

F.3d 749 (5th Cir. 2012), cert. granted.

On June 27, 2013, the Supreme Court granted certiorari as to the following question: "What, if any, causal relationship or nexus between the defendant's conduct and the victim's harm or damages must the government or the victim establish in order to recover restitution under 18 U.S.C. § 2259?"

The Supreme Court's interest in this issue is likely due to a circuit split: Both the Second and Ninth Circuits have held that child pornography victims are not able to recover restitution in cases where a defendant's actions were not a proximate cause of their injuries. See: United States v. Aumais, 656 F.3d 147 (2d Cir. 2011) and United States v. Kennedy, 643 F.3d 1251 (9th Cir. 2011) [PLN, Oct. 2011, p.26]. The Fourth Circuit reached a similar conclusion in United States v. Burgess, 684 F.3d 445 (4th Cir. 2012), as did the D.C. Circuit. See: United States v. Monzel, 641 F.3d 528 (D.C. Cir. 2011), cert. denied.

The case remains pending before the Supreme Court. ■

California: Felons with Prior Juvenile "Strikes" Excluded from County Jail Placement Under Realignment Act

THE CALIFORNIA COURT OF APPEAL held on March 20, 2013 that a prisoner whose prior record includes a juvenile adjudication for a serious or violent felony may not receive a county jail commitment, even if that was the intent when the legislature, in response to a federal court order mandating that the state prison system reduce its population, passed the Realignment Act (Act). [See, e.g.: PLN, Aug. 2013, p.20].

Under the Act, most prisoners with felony convictions are now committed to county jails instead of state prisons. Consistent with the Three Strikes Law, the Act excludes from its provisions prisoners with prior serious or violent felony convictions. Although the Act is silent about prior juvenile adjudications, its legislative history suggests that lawmakers had intended to exclude from prison felons whose prior "strikes" were the result of juvenile adjudications.

Such an interpretation of the Act, however, would conflict with the Three Strikes Law, which requires a commitment to state prison for any felon with a serious or violent strike – regardless of whether or not the strike was a juvenile adjudication.

The Court of Appeal held that this conflict must be resolved in favor of the voter-approved Three Strikes Law, which, as an initiative statute, may only be amended with voter approval or, under its express terms, by a two-thirds vote of the legislature. Thus, prisoners with serious or violent felony convictions as a result of juvenile adjudications are ineligible for county jail placement under the Act. See: People v. Delgado, 214 Cal.App.4th 914, 154 Cal.Rptr.3d 337 (Cal.App. 2d Dist. 2013), review denied. ■

PA Prison Lieutenant Fired After Assisting in Criminal Investigation

A FORMER PENNSYLVANIA PRISON lieutenant might now have a better understanding as to why many prisoners refuse to assist in criminal investigations.

In January 2011, Lt. Vincent Schaffer, 45, then a unit manager in F Block at SCI-Pittsburgh, was approached by an internal affairs officer to gather dirt on a fellow guard who was later charged with 89 criminal counts, including sexual assault.

"I was uncomfortable with my involvement in assisting in a criminal investigation because that is not what I do," Schaffer said in a 2012 interview.

However, he claimed his initial refusal would have been a violation of the code of ethics and that he risked disciplinary action if he failed to cooperate. Thus he ultimately complied, gathering information from a prison informant, and was subsequently terminated after 18 years with the Department of Corrections.

"I had a lot of pride in my job, and I gave the department 100% every day," Schaffer said. "To believe that I was put in this position, and to even try to comprehend that the department and the commonwealth have flat-out turned their backs – I don't even know the words."

As a result of the investigation, former SCI-Pittsburgh guard Harry F. Nicoletti was charged with targeting sex offenders – most of them on F Block awaiting transfer to other prisons – for abuse and sexual assault. Six other guards were criminally charged, and the facility's superintendent and three top managers were fired. [See: PLN, Nov. 2012, p.40; April 2012, p.1].

"Everyone below me got suspended," Schaffer said. "Everyone above me got fired."

What remains unclear is exactly why Schaffer was eventually terminated, and whether his firing was related to his position as unit manager over F Block or his assistance with the internal investigation.

Schaffer claimed that the demands of the investigation – including clandestine meetings with prisoner informant Casey Oliver – were so nerve-racking that he applied for workers' compensation in June 2011, which was denied. He then used up all of his vacation time and sick leave, went on family and medical leave, and began receiving unemployment benefits.

After obtaining medical clearance in March 2012 to return to work – but not at SCI-Pittsburgh because it could exacerbate his symptoms – Schaffer said he was told by a corrections official to either "return to full-time, full-duty work ... with a release from the health care provider," or retire or accept termination. Without a doctor's release, Schaffer applied for disability retirement, was denied and then was terminated – indicating that prison employees who assist with criminal investigations are not immune from adverse outcomes.

Nicoletti was convicted of 27 charges, including official oppression, simple assault, criminal solicitation and terrorist threats, and sentenced in March 2013 to probation and six months of house arrest. [See: PLN, May 2013, p.12]. ■

PLN Settles Censorship Suit Against Texas County Jail for $175,000

IN DECEMBER 2013, PRISON LEGAL News settled a federal lawsuit against Upshur County, Texas that alleged unconstitutional censorship when PLN's publications were rejected by jail officials. The suit, filed in October 2012, named the county, Sheriff Anthony Betterton and Sheriff's Lt. Jill McCauley as defendants.

According to the complaint, the Upshur County jail's inmate handbook contained "no written criteria explaining when a publication will be rejected," and the jail's mail policy did "not provide a sender any notice or explanation when a book is censored."

PLN mailed copies of its monthly publication to prisoners at the jail, as well as letters, renewal notices, brochures and copies of a book titled Protecting Your Health and Safety. The jail rejected approximately 90 of PLN's publications over a one-year period, stamping them "No Newspaper," "Unauthorized Mail," "Not Approved" or "Refused." The jail also rejected legal mail sent to prisoners by PLN's attorneys. No notice was provided regarding this censorship, and PLN was not afforded an opportunity to appeal the rejection of its publications.

"The purpose of jail is to hold the criminally accused for trial, not to punish them," said Lance Weber, general counsel for the Human Rights Defense Center (HRDC), PLN's non-profit parent organization. "Depriving pretrial detainees too poor to afford bail – who are presumed innocent – of access to information that could assist them in enforcing their rights is inexcusable."

On September 30, 2013, the district court granted PLN's motion for a preliminary injunction, finding "The evidence suggests that at least some of PLN's correspondence with prisoners has been withheld from its intended recipients, depriving Plaintiff of its First Amendment rights without due process of law."

The jail had adopted a new mail policy prior to entry of the preliminary injunction; the court found the revised policy was a "clear improvement," but "still falls short of establishing the minimum procedural safeguards constitutionally required to protect PLN's First and Fourteenth Amendment rights." The district court further held that PLN was likely to prevail on the merits of the case. Upshur County subsequently agreed to settle.

According to the terms of the settlement, entered as a consent decree, the defendants will implement a new Correspondence and Incoming Publications Plan at the jail, to include "disseminating a copy of the New Policy to all employees of the Upshur County Jail and confirming that each recipient has read the same, disseminating the New Policy to members of the general public by posting it conspicuously on a website maintained by or on behalf of the Upshur County Sheriff's Office, and disseminating a copy of the New Policy to inmates by including it in the inmate handbook and by posting a copy in common areas for at least fourteen days."

The jail's new mail policy provides that prisoners can receive periodicals, books, newspapers, brochures, magazines and other correspondence – subject to specified security concerns – and that both prisoners and those who send them mail will receive notification of any censorship by jail staff, and will have the ability to appeal same. The county also agreed to pay $175,000 in damages, costs and attorneys' fees.

"We are pleased with the outcome of this case, though it could have been resolved much earlier, at much lower cost to Upshur County, had county officials acknowledged that the previous mail policy in effect at the jail was inadequate," said PLN editor Paul Wright.

PLN was ably represented by attorneys Thomas S. Leatherbury, Sean W. Kelly, Kimberly R. McCoy and Marissa A. Wilson with the Dallas law firm of Vinson & Elkins LLP; Scott Medlock and Brian McGiverin with the Texas Civil Rights Project; and HRDC general counsel Lance Weber. See: *Prison Legal News v. # New Trial Granted in Jail Strip Search Case Following Jury Verdict; $385,000 Settlement

by Matt Clarke

On March 7, 2011, an Iowa federal district court granted a motion for a new trial after a jury awarded $259,155 to a woman who was improperly strip searched when she was arrested and booked into jail. Before another trial was held, a 2012 U.S. Supreme Court ruling changed the law regarding strip searches of jail detainees, and the case settled in February 2013 for more than the jury award.

Maureen Rattray was arrested in Sioux City, Iowa for operating a vehicle while intoxicated – her first offense – which was a serious misdemeanor in violation of Iowa Criminal Code § 321J.2. She was taken to the Woodbury County Jail. During booking, two female jailers strip searched her twice and conducted body cavity searches.

The first strip search took place in a room with an open door so men standing outside were able to look in. Rattray began to cry, and one of the jailers mocked her and then ripped off her halter top. Because she was confused about whether or not she was wearing a tampon, one of the jailers allegedly shoved her against a wall and performed a cavity search of her vagina. Rattray was then forced to walk unclothed down a hallway to the last cell, passing men who looked at her while she attempted to cover her breasts and genitalia with a jail-issued jumpsuit that guards had not allowed her to put on.

Once in the cell, Rattray was placed on the bed and a jailer put a knee on her back while performing a second cavity search of her vagina and genital area, during which Rattray cried and screamed. Only then was she allowed to dress.

The strip and body cavity searches were performed in accordance with jail policy, which prohibited such searches for persons arrested for simple misdemeanors and scheduled (code section) violations if there was no probable cause to believe they were concealing a weapon or contraband, but required searches for persons arrested for any other offense.

Rattray and two other women who were subjected to strip searches at the Woodbury County Jail, Lisa Lambert and Lori Mathes, filed civil rights actions pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983 against the county. Their cases, which were consolidated, alleged that the jail's policy of conducting strip and body cavity searches without reasonable suspicion violated the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against unreasonable searches and seizures.

The district court granted partial summary judgment to Rattray, finding that her Fourth Amendment rights had been violated by the strip and body cavity searches. The case then went to a jury trial on damages.

Initially, the jury awarded damages of $5,000 for past emotional distress, $500 for future emotional distress, $3,155 for past medical expenses, $500 for future medical expenses and $250,000 in nominal damages. This was contrary to the court's instruction not to award nominal damages unless no other damages were awarded, and in such case to only award $1. The judge explained the error and had the jury deliberate again. After ten minutes, the jury returned with an award of $250,000 for past emotional distress, $5,500 for future emotional distress, $3,155 for past medical expenses and $500 for future medical expenses.

The judge entered the verdict but the county filed a motion for a new trial, citing irregularities in the jury's second damages award. The judge agreed that it was unable to ascertain why the jury awarded $5,000 to Rattray for past emotional distress in the first verdict, then ten minutes later awarded her $250,000 for past emotional distress in the second verdict. Because "it is impossible to determine what was on the jury's mind," the motion for a new trial was granted.

But before another trial was held, a 2012 decision by the U.S. Supreme Court found that every detainee, even those incarcerated on a non-indictable offense, who will be admitted to a jail's "general population" may be required to undergo a close visual inspection while undressed without reasonable suspicion that he or she may have contraband. See: Florence v. Board of Chosen Freeholders of the County of Burlington, 132 S.Ct. 1510 (2012).

Lambert and Mathes' cases had not yet gone to trial prior to the decision in Flor- ence. Following the Supreme Court's ruling, county and jail officials filed motions for summary judgment, seeking dismissal of all three plaintiffs' claims. The district court held in a December 10, 2012 order that "summary judgment in favor of the County is appropriate on all of the plaintiffs' 'no reasonable suspicion' strip-search claims, in light of this [new] standard from Florence."

However, Rattray and Mathes had also objected to the "manner" in which the strip searches were conducted; consequently, the district court found that those claims could survive Florence – which did not articulate what manner of strip searches might be deemed overly invasive or objectionable – and set their cases for trial. The court entered summary judgment against Lambert.

Shortly before the new trial on Rattray and Mathes' remaining claims, the case settled in February 2013. According to one of the attorneys involved, the county settled with Rattray for $335,000, with Mathes for $40,000 and with Lambert (to forestall an appeal of the district court's summary judgment order) for $10,000. See: Rattray v. Woodbury County, Iowa, U.S.D.C. (N.D. Iowa), Case No. 5:07-cv-04014-MWB. ■

California: State Prisoner Cannot Serve Concurrent Sentence in County Jail

ON FEBRUARY 15, 2013, THE CALIFORNIA Court of Appeal held that when a sentence that otherwise would have been served in a county jail is ordered to run concurrent to a sentence already being served in state prison, the entire sentence must be served in prison.

In May 2011, Olivia S. Torres was sentenced to two years in state prison following burglary and forgery convictions in Tulare County.

On October 20, 2011, she pleaded guilty to receiving a stolen motor vehicle in Fresno County and stipulated to a two-year term to run concurrently with the sentence she was already serving. The trial court sentenced Torres to prison despite the fact that, under California's realignment statute, felons sentenced on or after October 1, 2011 now serve their sentences in county jail instead of prison. That statutory provision applies so long as a defendant is not disqualified by virtue of a current or prior "serious" or "violent" felony conviction, and is not required to register as a sex offender – factors that did not apply to Torres.

The Court of Appeal held that sentencing a felon to state prison for one part of a sentence and to county jail for another part could result in needless confusion and potentially absurd consequences. The appellate court wrote that it would be contrary to legislative intent if Torres ended up serving all or most of her postrelease community supervision period in county jail, and affirmed the trial court's order that she serve her entire sentence in prison.

The Court of Appeal noted that the California legislature had subsequently passed a bill, Pen. Code, § 669, subd. (d), that provided "express statutory authority" for a concurrent county jail sentence to be served in state prison. See: People v. Torres, 213 Cal. App. 4th 1151 (Cal. App. 5th Dist. 2013). ■

Iowa: Bad Faith or Misconduct can Overcome Mental-Process Privilege in Disciplinary Case

THE IOWA SUPREME COURT HAS HELD that administrative law judges (ALJs) in the Department of Corrections (DOC) are entitled to assert the mental-process privilege in an Office of Ombudsman investigation, but that privilege may be overcome upon a strong showing of bad faith or misconduct. In the case before the Court, the Ombudsman – a state watchdog agency – made the requisite showing to overcome the privilege.

Fort Dodge Correctional Facility prisoner Randy Linderman was charged with several disciplinary offenses on April 2, 2008, including Class B assault. He was “verbally disruptive and physically inappropriate with [a guard] to the point that the offender assaulted the officer with his body several times.” Specifically, Linderman chest bumped the guard two or three times and disobeyed commands until other guards arrived to take control.

At his disciplinary hearing, Linderman pleaded guilty and admitted he was angry at the time of the violation. ALJ Deb Edwards found him guilty of Class B assault and imposed a sanction of 180 days in disciplinary detention and 180 days loss of earned time. Linderman appealed to the warden, who affirmed Edwards’ decision. Rather than seek post-conviction judicial review, Linderman complained to the Office of Ombudsman.

During its investigation, the Ombudsman learned that Warden Cornell Smith had sent the ALJ an email which stated, “Please exercise sanctions to fit situation (180-365).” A Class B assault only carries a 90-day sanction, and the penalty imposed on Linderman was for a Class A assault. To increase the penalty, the ALJ must find aggravating circumstances by listing six factors from a nonexclusive list. None of the factors was expressly identified in Linderman’s disciplinary decision, nor were any of them present with respect to his offense.

An interview by a representative from the Ombudsman’s office found that ALJ Edwards stated she decided not to find aggravating factors for Linderman, but Warden Smith claimed Edwards had said she planned to do so. Subsequently, Edwards amended Linderman’s disciplinary decision to reflect that it was a Class A offense, but failed to list any aggravating factors.

The Ombudsman sought to depose Edwards about her “[m]otive, influences, and decision process” in the case. The DOC and Edwards objected, and the Ombudsman sought to enforce its subpoena by filing a petition in Polk County District Court in October 2010. The court held that the mental-process privilege did not apply to Ombudsman proceedings and granted summary judgment in favor of the Ombudsman’s office.

On appeal, the Iowa Supreme Court agreed with the outcome but not the district court’s finding that the mental-process privilege was inapplicable. The Court stated, “The mental-process privilege is a corollary to the deliberative process privilege that protects uncommunicated motivations for a policy or decision.” ALJs serve in a quasi-judicial role in disciplinary hearings and are entitled to mental-process privilege “absent a strong showing of bad faith or improper behavior sufficient to overcome that privilege.”

In this case, the ex parte communication from the warden, who hears prisoners’ disciplinary appeals and cannot increase the sanction on appeal, to the ALJ, whose independence from the DOC is statutorily mandated, exhibited improper conduct sufficient to overcome the mental-process privilege.

Therefore, the Ombudsman could compel testimony not only as to the ALJ’s “communications with the warden and others, but also regarding her thought processes to explain her decision in Linderman’s disciplinary proceedings.” Justice Bruce Zager issued a dissenting opinion. See: Office of Citizens’ Aide/Ombudsman v. Edwards, 825 N.W.2d 8 (Iowa 2012).

During a January 2014 phone interview, Ombudsman Ruth H. Cooperrider informed PLN that her office was able to depose Edwards upon remand, and that the investigation had concluded but a final report had not yet been released.

Edwards retired from her ALJ position with the DOC in June 2010, while the Ombudsman’s investigation was pending. ■

Prisoner Assaulted in Tennessee Jail Settles Suit for $530,000

by Derek Gilna

CURTIS DRESSMAN, A FORMER PRE-TRIAL detainee, has settled his § 1983 lawsuit against jail officials in Nashville, Tennessee after a judge denied the jail's motions for summary judgment. The district court found that Dressman had "a clearly established constitutional right to be [free] from deliberate indifference of inmate-on-inmate violence."

The court's November 27, 2012 order cited a culture of "deliberate indifference" by various jail officials with respect to prisoner safety at the Davidson County Criminal Justice Center. This, the court said, fostered a "fight club" atmosphere in the facility's booking and intake areas when non-violent pre-trial detainees were placed in the same cell as violent prisoners despite the availability of other, vacant holding cells.

The district court brushed aside assertions by jail officials that the April 2010 assault on Dressman by another intoxicated prisoner was an isolated incident, noting Dressman's assertion in his complaint that "offender/offender assaults" occurred "almost one per day." Dressman claimed that he suffered a "traumatic brain injury, dental and facial fractures, cuts, and permanent physical injuries and disfigurement, as a result of the attack."

The court found that the jail was "on notice at the time of the assault that [it] had an obligation to protect detainees from this violence." The district court noted, "In a recent case of inmate-on-inmate sexual abuse at a Michigan jail where inmates were held in a 12-person unit, the Sixth Circuit made clear that 'the constitutional right to be free from deliberate indifference to assault ... was clearly established.'" See: Bishop v. Hackel, 636 F.3d 757 (6th Cir. 2011) [PLN, April 2012, p.45].

The district court further wrote that "On several occasions, we have held that 'deliberate indifference' of constitutional magnitude may occur when prison guards fail to protect one inmate from an attack by another..." citing Walker v. Norris, 917

F.2d 1449 (6th Cir. 1990).

In denying the jail's motions for summary judgment, the court held that Dressman had adequately argued that there were empty holding cells available at the time of the assault, despite jail officials' assertions to the contrary. The court also said the jail's own records revealed a high level of prisoner-on-prisoner assaults during the previous year, including "thirty-four reported incidents of such assaults in the intake ... area in the four years before the incident at issue here," which was sufficient to substantiate Dressman's claims for the purposes of the summary judgment motions.

Following the district court's order, the case settled for $530,000, inclusive of attorney's fees and costs, in July 2013. Dressman was represented by Nashville attorney Edmund J. Schmidt III. See: Dressman v. Metropolitan Government of Nashville and Davidson County, U.S.D.C. (M.D. Tenn.), Case No. 3:11-cv-00336; 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 167640. ■

Arrested: What to do When Your Loved One's in Jail, by Wes Denham (Chicago Review Press, 2010). 263 pages (paperback), $16.95.

Book review by John E. Dannenberg

ARRRESTED: WHAT TO DO WHEN YOUR Loved One's in Jail is a detailed "how-to" manual for educating the uninformed about the harsh realities of what jail entails, with the ultimate goal being to guide family members as to 1) whether they should bother to try to help their loved one who's in the pokey, and 2) if so, how to best accomplish such assistance.

Author Wes Denham speaks from years of experience; he is a private investigator, often hired by families who want to aid an incarcerated loved one. Denham is cynical of both the system as well as the motives of prisoners who mainly want to get out of jail. Arrested is an incredibly insightful and pragmatic treatise for the outsider trying to cope with the ugly realities of jails, guards and prisoners. The book's 27 chapters are written in a blatantly sincere style that minces no words, often spiked with humorous cynicism. It could be described as a fun read were its subject matter not so serious and visceral.

Arrested steels the reader who is faced with the difficult decision of offering immediate financial help in response to an unexpected call in the middle of the night, announcing that their loved one has been jailed. They call asking for help in posting bail; they want commissary money put on their books; they want family members to make illicit phone calls for them; they seek visits; they need funds to hire the best attorney.

But the reality of the situation, per the well-informed author of Arrested, requires a measured response. For example, perhaps they are plainly guilty and just need a public defender to make a plea deal for them. Maybe they are desperate to survive and will use known information they remember – such as your bank account or Social Security number – as collateral in jail to pay unscrupulous drug dealers or commissary scalpers. Arrested goes into excruciating detail as to the types of scams you must suddenly be prepared to defend against; it is an incredible eye-opener into the ugly realities of jail life.

As Denham relates, one must first and foremost make a realistic determination with respect to what good, if any, will come from responding to an incarcerated loved one's urgent request for assistance. Is bail even available for the charges? Will he or she jump bail, leaving you to forfeit your home to the bail bond company? If they are released on bail for one charge, will they be rearrested upon release for another pending charge, resulting in instant bail forfeiture? Getting more personal, does the arrestee have a drug addiction that he is trying to maintain in jail by buying yet more drugs from other prisoners? Does he suffer from health problems that need immediate attention in the jail's typically abysmal medical system? Is he likely to be sexually victimized by other prisoners or guards? How can you get help by interceding on his behalf?

To comprehend how to analyze all of these variables, Arrested supplies the reader with sample forms with checkboxes that can be used to make rational decisions. Skull and crossbones flags are used as headers for warnings that should be carefully read. Perhaps the most unfortunate aspect of Arrested is that not enough people will read it before needing to know the sound advice presented in its 263 pages. Alternatively, Arrested will give the sociologically curious a truly distasteful vision of the seedy nature of America's jails.

Arrested: What to do When Your Loved One's in Jail is available in PLN's bookstore; see page 62 in this issue. ■

California: Sexually Violent Predator Entitled to Jury Trial on Petition Seeking Conditional Release

THE CALIFORNIA COURT OF APPEAL has reversed the denial of a petition for conditional release filed by a sexually violent predator (SVP) who had received a psychological evaluation indicating that conditional release would be in his best interest and consistent with public safety.

As an SVP committed for indeterminate treatment, Michael James Smith was examined annually pursuant to section 6605 of the Sexually Violent Predator Act (SVPA), Welf. & Inst. Code § 6600 et seq., to determine whether he should remain classified as an SVP. In July 2009, Smith received an evaluation recommending his conditional release. The following year he received an evaluation opining that he was "no longer an SVP and was entitled to unconditional release."

After receiving the initial favorable evaluation in 2009, Smith filed a petition for conditional release which he later supplemented with a copy of his even more favorable 2010 evaluation. The trial court denied the petition, finding that Smith failed to carry his burden of proof.

On appeal, Smith argued that the trial court had erroneously placed the burden of proof on him. The Court of Appeal agreed, holding that under the SVPA, as amended by Proposition 83 in 2006, if the mental condition of a committed person is found to have improved to the point that he or she can either be unconditionally discharged or conditionally released to a community-based program without endangering the public, and the person petitions for the recommended relief, the state bears the burden of proof in a trial at which the person has the right to demand a jury. Prior to the 2006 amendments, by contrast, the allocation of the burden of proof differed depending on whether conditional or unconditional release was sought.

The appellate court also found that Smith's counsel provided ineffective assistance by failing to request a hearing under section 6605 rather than section 6608, as only the former statute provides for a jury trial. "[T]here could be no acceptable tactical reason for failing to seek relief under section 6605 in preference to section 6608," the Court of Appeal wrote.

The trial court's order was therefore reversed and the case remanded for further proceedings. See: People v. Smith, 212 Cal. App. 4th 1394 (Cal. App. 1st Dist. 2013). ■

Qualified Immunity Denied to Prison Psychiatrist who Prescribed Lethal Drug Combination; $450,000 Settlement

THE SIXTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS has affirmed the denial of qualified immunity to a psychiatrist in a lawsuit brought by a prisoner's estate. The appellate court found the evidence could establish that the psychiatrist had "consciously exposed" the prisoner "to a substantial risk of death through his medical treatment without so much as a warning." The case settled for $450,000 following remand.

When Scott Quigley, Jr., 23, was transferred from a Michigan Department of Corrections (MDOC) facility to the Charles Egeler Reception and Guidance Center in February 2008, he came under the medical supervision and care of Correctional Medical Services, the MDOC's private contractor.

The day after Quigley arrived at the guidance center, physician's assistant Steven Garver conducted a physical exam and prescribed 50mg of Amitriptyline (brand name Elavil) once a day, which was double Quigley's previous prescription. A few weeks later, on March 7, 2008, Dr. Tuong V. Thai, a psychiatrist, completed a comprehensive psychiatric assessment; Quigley's current prescription was discussed, as was adding the medication Trazodone (brand name Desyrel).

Dr. Thai prescribed 100mg of Trazodone once a day for four weeks. Three days later, Quigley was found dead in his cell. Prison charts confirmed that he had received both Amitriptyline and Trazodone during the previous three days; the cause of his death was not clearly established. In a "battle of experts," Quigley's estate submitted expert testimony that he had suffered a fatal drug interaction resulting in serotonin syndrome, while Thai's experts claimed Quigley's death was due to an epileptic seizure.

The district court denied Dr. Thai's motion for summary judgment, in which he argued he was entitled to qualified immunity. The court found there was sufficient evidence to conclude that Quigley likely died as a result of the treatment he received for depression, and that treatment which kills an otherwise healthy 23-year-old constitutes a "substantial risk of harm warranting constitutional protection."

The Sixth Circuit agreed, holding that Quigley's estate had satisfied the objective component of an Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference claim by demonstrating his medical need was "sufficiently serious." Turning to the subjective component – that Dr. Thai could infer a substantial risk to Quigley and had disregarded that risk – the appellate court held a reasonable fact finder could find for the estate on that point.

The record showed that "it is well known in the psychiatric profession that a tetracyclic like Trazodone should not be administered in conjunction with a tricyclic like Amitriptyline because the drugs exponentially increase the potency of one another, 'lead to toxic levels and are deadly.'" Thai's notes indicated he had discussed with Quigley his Amitriptyline prescription and explained the side effects of Trazodone, but did not advise him to not take both simultaneously or inform medical staff to not dispense both drugs.

Finally, the Court of Appeals found the right at issue was clearly established. "Obviously, if a doctor knows that his actions could kill a prisoner and takes those actions anyway without even advising of the risk, that amounts to more than a reasonable mistake in medical judgment," the Court wrote. In sum, a doctor may not consciously expose a patient "to an excessive risk of serious harm."

The Sixth Circuit affirmed the district court's denial of qualified immunity. It also affirmed a state law gross negligence claim, as it was similar to the subjective component of the Eighth Amendment claim. See: Quigley v. Thai, 707 F.3d 675 (6th Cir. 2013).

Following remand, the case settled in October 2013 for a total of $450,000. Of that amount, $171,705.94 went towards attorneys' fees and costs, and the balance of $278,294.06 went to Quigley's mother and the personal representative of his estate. ■

Medical Parole for Texas Prisoners on the Decline

by Matt Clarke

THE NUMBER OF PRISONERS GRANTED medical parole in Texas decreased in fiscal year 2012 compared with those paroled due to medical reasons in the previous two years. The Texas Board of Pardons and Paroles approved just 72 prisoners for medical parole in FY 2012, down from 100 in FY 2011 and 102 in FY 2010.

Although medical parole – officially called Medically Recommended Intensive Supervision – may be insignificant in terms of reducing Texas' prison population, it can have a much greater effect on the amount of money spent on prisoners' health care. Medical parole can also relieve the strain on the limited number of prison hospital beds available – about 300 statewide for a prison population of 150,000 that is growing older each year, and thus in need of more medical treatment.

"It's becoming an issue for the state and the [criminal justice] department," said Dr. Owen Murray, vice president for prisoner health care at the University of Texas Medical Branch, which provides medical services for over two-thirds of Texas prisoners. "We have been very vigilant about doing everything we can to look after these patients. The parole board is in a difficult spot. [Besides costs] they really have to look out for public safety. I don't envy their job, trying to balance those two things."

Parole officials, however, have denied they take costs into account when deciding whether to grant parole based on medical reasons.

"The medical care cost is not included in the information sent to the board," said Rissie L. Owens, chairwoman of the Board of Pardons and Paroles (BPP). "The [BPP] makes a determination based on the inmate's medical condition and medical evaluation and if he will be a threat to public safety," she stated. "Along with the nature of the inmate's crimes and ability to carry out future criminal activity, the board looks at things like the prisoner's degree of mobility, assistance needed for daily living, cognitive condition and expected life expectancy."

According to state records, the ten

Texas prisoners with the most expensive medical conditions cost the state almost $2 million in 2011 alone. While prisoners over the age of 55 make up just 8% of Texas' prison population, they account for 30% of the prison system's medical expenses.

The vast majority of medical parole applications are denied. In FY 2012, for example, the BPP screened 1,857 applications, of which 491 were presented to parole officials and 72 were granted – an approval rate of 3.8%. Some prisoners have died while their applications were pending.

Most medical parolees are simply sent home to die; 68.1% of prisoners paroled due to medical reasons in FY 2012 were terminally ill, while 29.2% needed long-term care. From December 1, 1991 through the end of FY 2012, around 1,480 prisoners were released on medical parole. Of those, 986 (66%) have died, 268 finished their sentences, 121 remain on parole supervision and 67 (4.5%) returned to prison.

The nature of a prisoner's offense is not considered by the doctors who recommend medical parole. "We don't know what their crimes are; we just submit them based on their medical criteria," Murray said.

Rather, the nature of a prisoner's offense is taken into account when the BPP reviews the application for medical parole. At that point the district attorney (DA) for the sentencing jurisdiction is notified and allowed to provide input. Due to federal medical privacy laws, however, the DA is not informed of the nature of the prisoner's health condition. This has led some prosecutors, such as Tarrant County DA Joe Shannon, Jr., to oppose all medical parole requests.

"Do they have a sore throat or a hang-nail, or are they dying of cancer?" asked Shannon. "I'm not going to release someone for intensive medical treatment if I don't know why they are being treated. I'm not going to overturn a jury verdict or plea of guilty without any information at all.... I don't know what they need that cannot be provided inside the prison."

Of course, a serious, debilitating and usually life-threatening condition is a prerequisite to even apply for medical parole, and prisoners aren't paroled to get better treatment but rather because their medical condition makes it unlikely they will pose a threat to public safety. Once released, they may qualify for health care services through Medicaid or Medicare.

Regardless, some are still critical of the medical parole process.

"The state government through the Board of Pardons and Paroles appears to be playing a shell game or hot potato by shifting the cost of inmate care to the county and the federal government," said former Harris County assistant DA Kim Ogg. "It sounds like an austerity measure taken by the state at the expense of crime victims."

In January 2013, state Rep. Senfronia Thompson introduced HB 512, which would remove certain eligibility restrictions for prisoners who apply for medical parole – including restrictions on prisoners convicted of violent crimes and sex offenses – but would also limit the types of conditions for which medical parole is available. The bill died in the House Committee on Corrections. Legislation containing similar provisions, SB 991, was passed by the Senate but died in committee in May 2013. ■

Court Employee Fired for Helping Wrongfully Convicted Prisoner Prove His Innocence

by Christopher Zoukis

IN 1984, ROBERT E. NELSON WAS CONVICTED and sentenced by Jackson County, Missouri Circuit Court Judge David M. Byrn to 50 years in prison for forcible rape, 5 years for forcible sodomy and 15 years for first-degree robbery, plus two unrelated robbery convictions. Nelson's sentence for the latter two convictions ended in 2006, leaving him serving time for the remaining robbery and sexual offenses.

In August 2009, Nelson petitioned Judge Byrn for post-conviction DNA testing which was not available at his trial 25 years earlier. That request, and a second request in October 2011, were both denied because Nelson had cited a state statute that was not expansive enough to allow for his DNA to be tested. Following the second denial, Judge Byrn's administrative assistant, 70-year-old great-grandmother Sharon Snyder, took pity on Nelson. Snyder located a DNA testing motion that had been granted in another case – a public document freely available to those who knew where to look – and provided it to Nelson's sister to pass along.

Nelson used the successful motion as a guide and petitioned the court for DNA testing a third time on February 22, 2012. His motion was granted, he was found to be indigent and Midwest Innocence Project legal director Laura O'Sullivan was appointed to represent him. The Kansas City Police Department's crime lab tested evidence from the crime scene and found it did not match Nelson's DNA, though it did match two other suspects. Nelson was released from prison on June 12, 2013 upon the joint request of prosecutors and the Midwest Innocence Project, after serving three decades – mostly on the unrelated robbery convictions. Both of his parents had died while he was incarcerated.

"If we had not found this mistake that occurred, it's likely he would have served out the rest of his sentence, and the real perpetrators would not have been identified," said Jackson County Prosecutor Jean Peters Baker. "This is a day that justice is being served."

Five days after Nelson's release from prison, justice was not served when Snyder was suspended by Court Administrator Jeffrey Eisenbeis for providing the DNA testing motion that eventually resulted in Nelson's wrongful conviction being overturned. Judge Byrn fired Snyder on June 27, 2013, calling her decision to give the motion to Nelson's sister "clearly improper" and a violation of Canon Seven of the court's code of ethics, which prohibits court employees from giving legal advice.

Snyder, who had planned to retire in nine months, at first was alarmed that she would lose her pension. "[A]ll I could do was curl up in a fetal position and cry," she stated. After learning that her pension was safe, she said she felt she was on strong moral ground.

"I lent an ear to his sister, and maybe I did wrong.... But if it was my brother, I would go to every resource I could possibly find" to help him, she said. "I think that the law should be changed, that judges should be taken out of the mix on deciding these DNA motions, and they should automatically be granted." ■

NY Prisoner's Youthful Age Considered in Modifying Prison Disciplinary Sanction

THE APPELLATE DIVISION OF NEW YORK'S Supreme Court, Fourth Judicial Division, after taking into account a prisoner's youthfulness, modified the penalty imposed in a prison disciplinary hearing.

Prisoner Paul Cookhorne was charged with violating various prison rules that included assaulting and injuring a guard. Cookhorne, who was 17 years old at the time of the violations, was found guilty at a tier III disciplinary hearing and ordered to serve four years in the Special Housing Unit (SHU) and lose four years of good time, among various other sanctions.

Cookhorne filed a "hybrid CPLR article 78 proceeding and declaratory judgment action" challenging the guilt determination and punishment imposed. He also sought a declaration that prison officials consider the age of 16- and 17-year-olds as a mitigating factor in all disciplinary proceedings. By order of the Erie County Supreme Court, the case was transferred to the Appellate Division.

The appellate court severed the causes of action and transferred the part seeking declaratory judgment back to the Supreme Court for further proceedings. The Appellate Division then ruled on Cookhorne's claims seeking relief under CPLR article 78. Initially, the court found that the disciplinary report, testimony of the guard and photographic evidence constituted substantial evidence that Cookhorne had violated prison rules.

As to the punishment imposed, the appellate court held that the sanctions were "so disproportionate to the offense, in the light of all the circumstances, as to be shocking to one's sense of fairness." Taking into consideration Cookhorne's young age at the time, all of the circumstances surrounding the incident and the New York State Department of Corrections' disciplinary guidelines, the court concluded the maximum penalty that should have been imposed was 18 months in the SHU plus the loss of 18 months' good time credits and loss of phone, commissary and package privileges for the same period of time.

Therefore, the Appellate Division ordered Cookhorne's disciplinary sanction to be so modified, and wrote that nothing in its order should be construed to limit the scope of issues or relief in the declaratory judgment action pending before the lower court. See: Cookhorne v. Fischer, 960 N.Y.S.2d 798, 104 A.D.3d 1197 (N.Y. App. Div. 4th Dep't 2013). ■

Eighth Circuit: No Qualified Immunity for Excessive Use of Force, Retaliation

THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS has affirmed a district court's denial of qualified immunity on a prisoner's retaliation and excessive force claims.

On July 26, 2008, Missouri prisoner Victor Santiago faced administrative segregation for failing to report to his work assignment at the Potosi Correctional Center. When he allegedly became combative, several guards pepper sprayed and handcuffed him, then slammed him into a wall and the floor. A guard "tightened the handcuffs to the 'crushing point.'" When Santiago claimed his wrist was broken, a nurse allegedly said "it don't look broke to me," and walked away. He was not allowed to wash off the pepper spray for about 35 minutes.

After Santiago filed an excessive force grievance, guard Shannon Clubbs and Lieutenant Daniel Blair allegedly retaliated against him and attempted to chill his use of the grievance process by making death threats and moving him to a cell with worse living conditions, including no personal property, bedding or running water, and a non-working toilet.

Santiago filed suit in federal court in 2009, alleging excessive force, deliberate indifference and retaliation. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants on Santiago's official capacity claims but not his individual capacity claims. On appeal, the Eighth Circuit first held that the district court had improperly applied the Fourth Amendment legal standard when resolving Santiago's excessive force claim. It remanded for analysis of that claim under the Eighth Amendment standard articulated in Johnson v. Bi-State Justice Center/Arkansas Department of Corrections, 12 F.3d 133 (8th Cir. 1993).

The Court of Appeals then held that Clubbs was not entitled to qualified immunity on Santiago's claim of retaliatory death threats, finding that "a reasonable jury could conclude that Clubbs issued the death threats because Santiago had filed and pursued his excessive force grievance."

Likewise, the appellate court found that Lt. Blair was not entitled to qualified immunity on the retaliation claims. "Taken in the light most favorable to Santiago, a reasonable jury could conclude that [the] facts demonstrate that Blair took the ... adverse actions because of Santiago's continued use of the prison grievance procedure," the Eighth Circuit wrote, noting that "The right to be free from retaliation for availing one's self of the prison grievance process has been clearly established in this circuit for more than twenty years."

Turning to Santiago's retaliatory discipline claim against Clubbs, the Court of Appeals held that it was "undisputed that Clubbs filed a [disciplinary] report detailing Santiago's alleged assault and that Santiago was brought before a disciplinary action board for a hearing at which he was found guilty of assault." The Eighth Circuit noted that "claims of retaliation fail if the alleged retaliatory conduct violations were issued for the actual violation of a prison rule," citing Hartsfield v. Nichols, 511 F.3d 826 (8th Cir. 2008). As such, Santiago's retaliatory discipline claim "fails as a matter of law and Clubbs is entitled to qualified immunity" on that claim.

Finally, the Court of Appeals found that Captain Garry Branch was entitled to qualified immunity on Santiago's deliberate indifference claim because there was no evidence he had deliberately disregarded Santiago's medical needs with respect to his injured wrist. See: Santiago v. Blair, 707 F.3d 984 (8th Cir. 2013).

Following remand, the district court appointed counsel to represent Santiago; this case remains pending with a jury trial scheduled for July 28, 2014. ■

Islamic Organization Petitions to Let Muslim Women Prisoners Wear Hijabs

by Christopher Zoukis

IN MAY 2013, THE COUNCIL ON American-Islamic Relations (CAIR) petitioned the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) to establish a uniform policy for all local, state and federal correctional facilities to allow Muslim women to wear hijab head coverings while incarcerated and when photos are taken, such as during the booking process.

According to an interview with Al Arabiya, a Saudi-owned news outlet, Nadhira Al-Khalili, CAIR's legal counsel, said, "I'm working on several pending cases in different states and I'm in touch with an attorney for the [DOJ's] Office of Civil Rights."

The executive director of CAIR's Michigan chapter, Dawud Walid, said the city of Novi, Michigan had adopted a policy to allow Muslim women to keep their hijab while in jail. "If hijab is allowed in the military, and U.S. driving licenses permit women IDs with hijab, then the same logic can be applied," he noted. "Hijab doesn't impede the identity of women."

The federal Bureau of Prisons allows Muslim women prisoners to retain and wear hijab headscarves pursuant to BOP Program Statement 5360.09. While some federal facilities require prisoners to remove their hijab for inspection upon arrival at the prison and after visits and outside trips, they are otherwise permitted to wear hijabs. State Departments of Corrections have varying protocols regarding religious head coverings.

Whether a national policy could be implemented is unclear, but Al-Khalili remains optimistic. While noting that "[t]he courts generally don't want to intervene in the professional judgment of a sheriff," he said some courts have ruled in favor of Muslim women with respect to wearing hijabs.

One case involving a prisoner's right to wear a hijab was heard by the en banc Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, which reversed a panel decision holding that Orange County, California deputies hadn't violated a Muslim woman's right to wear a hijab. See: Khatib v. County of Orange, 639 F.3d 898 (9th Cir. 2011) (en banc), cert. denied.

Souhair Khatib had been detained in a courthouse cell on a probation matter in June 2006 when a male booking officer ordered her to hand over her hijab. Having her head uncovered in public, especially in front of men, was "a serious breach of [her] faith, a deeply humiliating and defiling experience."

She sued under the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLU-IPA), claiming a substantial burden of her right to practice her religion. The Court of Appeals initially ruled against her, finding that a courthouse holding cell is not an "institution" as defined by RLUIPA. However, an en banc decision sent the case back to the district court for review on the merits, to determine whether Khatib's right to wear a hijab was protected under RLUIPA.

The case settled after remand in February 2013, with Orange County agreeing to prohibit sheriff's deputies from ordering prisoners to remove religious attire in ways that violate their beliefs; the settlement applies not only to Muslims but to those of other faiths, such as Sikhs (who wear turbans) and Jews (who wear yarmulkes). The county also agreed to train sheriff's deputies on the new policy and to pay $85,000 in damages, fees and costs.

"I praise Allah and thank Him that I live in a country where I can practice my religion freely," Khatib stated. "While not everyone understands Islam or what it requires of me, I'm grateful that the U.S. government protects my right to fulfill my duty to Allah, whether at work, on a public street or, yes, even in a sheriff's holding facility."

In March 2013, CAIR announced that it applauded a decision by the Alvin S. Glenn Detention Center in Richland County, South Carolina to change its policy to allow Muslim women to wear hijabs. CAIR had contacted the jail after a Muslim prisoner claimed she was intimidated into removing her hijab when a booking photo was taken.

"As requested, we have reviewed and updated our policies to ensure clarity with our staff on the processing and searching of female detainees of the Muslim faith, and specifically have exempted the wearing of religious headwear from our facility's 'Prohibited Acts' policy," stated Ronaldo D. Myers, the jail's director.

Similarly, as of January 2013, prisoners at the King County jail in Washington state are permitted to wear generic hijabs and other religious head coverings that are provided by the sheriff's department. The head coverings can be inspected for security purposes, but only by a guard of the same gender as the prisoner. ■

West Virginia Sex Offender Does Not Have Right to Attend Specified Church

THE WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT held on February 22, 2013 that a convicted sex offender does not have an automatic right to attend religious services of his choice. The Court's ruling was not based on the right to exercise religious freedoms under the state or federal constitutions, however; it was instead based, as the petitioner urged, upon a provision of the Home Incarceration Act.

Before the state Supreme Court was a habeas petition filed by Charles R. Elder, who entered guilty pleas to charges of sexual abuse by a person in a position of trust and third-degree sexual assault. In its brief, the state alleged Elder had "perpetrated hundreds, if not thousands, of sexual assaults against his stepdaughters while they were minors and that after one of the stepdaughters was impregnated by the petitioner, the petitioner himself performed a crude abortion on the victim."

Due to Elder's diagnosis of Parkinson's disease, post-traumatic stress disorder and depression, he was allowed to serve his concurrent sentences of ten-to-twenty years and one-to-five years on home confinement. The Supreme Court noted this was the first time it had "squarely addressed the issue of whether home incarceration constitutes the qualifying level of incarceration for purposes of seeking post-conviction relief in habeas corpus," and the Court found that home confinement met the definition of "incarceration" and thus the requirements for filing a habeas petition.

As to Elder's ineffective assistance of counsel claim raised in his petition, the Supreme Court held that given Elder's "admission to committing undisputedly offensive criminal conduct," his attorney's failure to file an unmeritorious appeal and motion for reconsideration did not constitute ineffective assistance.

With respect to Elder's claim that the trial court had refused to allow him to attend religious services at the Weston Church of God, the Supreme Court acknowledged the Home Incarceration Act provides for religious exceptions. However, Elder had overlooked "an implied need to determine whether [the statute's] exceptions apply to the particular offender," which was subject to the trial court's approval.

Elder was not attending church at the time he was sentenced, and the trial court took into account its "duty to protect the children who would either be on the church bus or van or inside the sanctuary during worship services." The trial court also noted that the pastor and members of the Weston Church of God were regularly visiting

Elder's home for Bible studies. Although Elder "does not have an automatic right to attend religious services" under the Home Incarceration Act, he "is free to exercise his religious freedom in other ways," the Supreme Court concluded. See: Elder v. Scolapia, 230 W.Va. 422, 738 S.E.2d 924 (W.Va. 2013). ■

Ninth Circuit Reverses Dismissal of Wiccan Prisoners' Establishment Clause Claim

ON FEBRUARY 19, 2013, THE NINTH Circuit reversed a district court's dismissal of a lawsuit brought under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 by two California prisoners who alleged that prison officials had violated their constitutional rights by failing to apply neutral criteria in determining whether paid chaplaincy positions were necessary to meet the religious needs of prisoners adhering to religions outside the five major mainstream faiths – Catholic, Protestant, Jewish, Muslim and Native American.

State prisoners Caren Hill and Shawna Hartmann, practicing Wiccans at the Central California Women's Facility (CCWF) in Chowchilla, filed suit claiming that California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR) officials had violated their religious rights.

They raised claims under the First Amendment's Free Exercise and Establishment Clauses, the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause and the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), as well as the California Constitution, related to the CDCR's refusal to hire a paid full-time Wiccan chaplain and failure to apply neutral criteria in evaluating whether a growing membership in minority religions warranted a reallocation of the resources used to accommodate prisoners' religious exercise needs.

The district court dismissed the plaintiffs' third amended complaint on the ground that it failed to state a claim for relief under Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(6).

On appeal, the Ninth Circuit held that the Free Exercise Clause only requires prison officials to provide prisoners a "reasonable opportunity" to practice their faith, and that insofar as the CDCR allows staff chaplains of other faiths, as well as volunteer Wiccan chaplains, to assist Wiccan prisoners in the practice of their religion – and Hill and Hartmann conceded that they had received such assistance – their Free Exercise claim failed. The appellate court noted that "it is well-settled that the First Amendment does not require prison administration to provide inmates with the chaplain of their choice."

With respect to the Equal Protection claim, the Court of Appeals held the complaint lacked facts demonstrating that prison officials had acted with discriminatory intent.

In regard to the RLUIPA claim, the Court found that the complaint failed to allege any factual allegations showing that the plaintiffs' religious exercise was so substantially burdened that they felt pressured to abandon their faith.

Addressing the Establishment Clause claim, however, the Ninth Circuit took note of the plaintiffs' allegations that more prisoners practice the Wiccan religion at CCWF than there are practicing Jewish, Muslim and Catholic prisoners at the facility, yet only Wiccans lacked the benefit of a paid full-time chaplain. If proven, the Court of Appeals held, those allegations could establish that CDCR "favor[s] some religions over others on a preferential basis" in violation of the Establishment Clause. Thus, the district court's judgment was reversed as to that claim and a state constitutional claim.

Hartmann was released prior to the appellate court's ruling, which mooted her claims for declaratory and injunctive relief. Hill and Hartmann were ably represented by attorneys David C. Kiernan, Thomas Ritchie and Barbara McGraw. See: Hartmann v. California Dept. of Corrections and Rehabilitation, 707 F.3d 1114 (9th Cir. 2013).

Following remand, Hill was released several weeks after the Ninth Circuit's ruling as a result of changes in the application of California's three-strikes law. Consequently, since the lawsuit did not include a request for monetary damages, the remaining claims were mooted and the case was voluntarily dismissed in June 2013. ▀

Rules Governing Lethal Injections Not Required under Georgia Law

THE GEORGIA SUPREME COURT HAS held that the state's Board of Corrections (BOC) is not statutorily required to promulgate rules governing lethal injections. The Court further held that neither the Georgia Department of Corrections (DOC) nor the Commissioner of Corrections has statutory authority to promulgate any legally binding rules.

This case involved the appeal of a superior court's dismissal of a mandamus petition filed by Warren Lee Hill, who is on death row for beating a fellow prisoner to death with a board studded with nails. The petition accused the BOC, DOC and Commissioner of failing to comply with the state's Administrative Procedure Act (APA) when adopting Georgia's new execution procedure. The new procedure, announced in July 2012, changed the three-drug lethal injection protocol to a one-drug protocol.

Initially, the Supreme Court noted that the APA specifically states the BOC and its penal institutions are not "agencies" under the Act. Therefore, unless provided for elsewhere in state law, the APA's requirements do not apply to the BOC and DOC.

Hill argued that OCGA Title 42 states the BOC shall adopt rules governing, among other things, the "treatment" of prisoners. The Court rejected Hill's argument that the term treatment includes the manner in which prisoners are executed; rather, it said that term has a more-focused meaning of "medical care." To hold otherwise would render other parts of the statute superfluous or meaningless.

The Supreme Court agreed the BOC has the authority to make rules governing lethal injection procedures, but found it does not have a legal duty to do so. "[T]he Board is not specifically required by statute to make rules governing the particular subject of lethal injection procedures and ... the Board also has not abused its discretion in declining to exercise its general statutory authority to make rules governing any aspect of the prison system in declining to make such rules," the Court wrote.

Lethal injection protocols are heavily litigated and closely scrutinized by state and federal courts, and such litigation and scrutiny have required the DOC Commissioner "to make repeated changes to lethal injection procedures." It is not unreasonable for the BOC to entrust such specific areas of management to the Commissioner, the Supreme Court held.

Finally, it is the BOC, not the DOC or Commissioner, that has authority to create rules governing the state's prison system. The Commissioner can propose that the BOC adopt rules within his management areas but has no legal duty to make such proposals. The dismissal of Hill's mandamus petition was affirmed, and the Supreme Court lifted the stay of execution it had granted pending the resolution of his appeal. See: Hill v. Owens, 292 Ga. 380, 738 S.E.2d 56 (Ga. 2013). ▀

Private Corrections Institute Issues First Annual Awards for Activism, Advocacy and Reporting on Private Prisons

ON JANUARY 7, 2014, THE PRIVATE Corrections Institute (PCI), a Florida-based non-profit citizen watchdog organization, issued its first annual awards for individual activism, organizational advocacy and excellence in news reporting related to the private prison industry. PCI opposes the privatization of correctional services, including the operation of prisons and jails by for-profit companies.

PCI's first annual award for excellence in reporting on the private prison industry was awarded to journalist Beau Hodai, who publishes DBA Press (www.dbapress.com), for his investigative articles on issues related to Corrections Corporation of America (CCA) and the GEO Group – the nation's two largest private prison firms.

Beau broke the news story about CCA's involvement in highly controversial anti-immigrant legislation in Arizona known as SB 1070 – a story that was subsequently picked up by other media, including National Public Radio. He also reported on political connections between GEO Group and Florida lawmakers in connection with an FBI probe involving the GEO-operated Blackwater River Correctional Facility in Florida. Several of his articles have been reprinted in Prison Legal News.

"The individuals who comprise the Private Corrections Institute are amazingly knowledgeable, dedicated, skilled and resourceful. To know that this group has found my work worthy of recognition is a deep honor," Beau stated.

Frank Smith received PCI's first annual award for exceptional activism against the privatization of correctional services. Frank, who previously served as PCI's field organizer assisting local communities in site fights against private prisons, is now a consultant for the Private Corrections Working Group. He is a retired Alaska state social worker and was elected to offices in three states, including two terms in the Kansas Silver Haired Legislature. Further, he authored a chapter in Capitalist Punishment, a 2003 anthology, titled "Incarceration of Native Americans and Private Prisons." He has long been an opponent of prison privatization.

"The for-profit prison industry is so corruptive, dangerous and larcenous that it makes opposing their expansion plans a good deal easier than it might otherwise be, were they simply exploitative," Frank said upon accepting the award.

Finally, PCI's first annual award for outstanding advocacy against the privatization of correctional services went to Grassroots Leadership, a North Carolina-based non-profit organization. Grassroots Leadership has been involved in the fight against private prisons – including site fights, community organizing, legislative advocacy and research – for over a decade.

The organization was instrumental in pushing for the closure of the CCA-run Dawson State Jail in Texas in 2013 and has produced numerous reports concerning the private prison industry, including "Corrections Corporation of America: A Critical Look at its First Twenty Years" (2003); "Operation Streamline: Costs and Consequences" (Sept. 2012); "The Dirty Thirty: Nothing to Celebrate About 30 Years of Corrections Corporation of America" (July 2013); and most recently, "Locked Up and Shipped Away: Interstate Prisoner Transfer and the Private Prison Industry" (Nov. 2013). The award was presented to Grassroots Leadership's executive director, Bob Libal.

"The mass incarceration and detention of people for the profit of corporations is one of the moral outrages of our time," Libal noted. "For years, the work of the Private Corrections Institute has been instrumental in exposing this industry. It's an honor for Grassroots Leadership to receive this award."

"PCI is pleased to recognize the contributions of these awardees to the ongoing debate over the privatization of correctional services," said PCI president Alex Friedmann, who also serves as managing editor of Prison Legal News and spent six years at a CCA-operated prison in the 1990s prior to his release in 1999. "PCI believes that incarcerating people for the purpose of generating corporate profit is immoral and has no place in a democratic society. Activism and advocacy against prison privatization, as well as accurate reporting on the private prison industry, are necessary to confront and end this social injustice."

The next Private Corrections Institute awards will be issued in January 2015. ■

Deliberate Indifference Medical Claim Accrues Upon Discovery of Injury and its Cause

THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT COURT OF Appeals has articulated a rule for determining when a prisoner's claim of deliberate indifference to a serious medical need accrues. In so doing, the Court reversed an Indiana federal district court's dismissal of a prisoner's lawsuit predicated upon expiration of the statute of limitations.

When Eugene Devbrow entered the Indiana Department of Correction (DOC) in 2000, he informed medical staff that a 1998 prostate-specific antigen (PSA) test revealed elevated levels, but a biopsy had come back benign. He further advised that his doctor said another test should be conducted in two to four years.

A PSA test conducted at Pendleton Correctional Facility on February 3, 2004 indicated that Devbrow had levels significantly elevated above normal. Nurse Practitioner Kelley Carroll requested a urology consultation, but Dr. Eke Kalu, the regional medical director for Prison Health Services, the DOC's private medical contractor, would not authorize it. Another test was conducted a week later, showing an even higher level. Dr. Malak Hermina examined Devbrow, found his prostate enlarged, and requested a urology consult. Again, Kalu denied the request.

Another PSA test was not conducted until February 10, 2005; it showed even higher elevation levels. Devbrow was taken to a hospital on April 27, 2005 to see a urologist and have a biopsy, which revealed a precursor to cancer. A follow-up biopsy in September confirmed that Devbrow had prostate cancer, and he received that diagnosis on October 21, 2005. A subsequent bone scan on December 16 revealed the cancer had spread to his spine and was no longer operable.

Devbrow sued Kalu, Hermina and Carroll on October 19, 2007, alleging their delay in ordering a prostate biopsy prevented the diagnosis of cancer until after it had metastasized. The defendants moved to dismiss the suit as untimely under the two-year statute of limitations for personal injury actions under state law. The district court granted their motions, finding the limitations period had commenced when Devbrow was referred for a biopsy on April 27, 2005.

On appeal, the Seventh Circuit held that when a civil rights action is "based on a medical injury arising from deliberate indifference, the relevant injury for statute-of-limitations purposes is not the intangible harm to the prisoner's constitutional rights but the physical injury caused by the defendants' indifference to the prisoner's medical needs," referencing Richards v. Mitchell, 696 F.3d 635 (7th Cir. 2012).

A deliberate indifference claim, therefore, accrues "when the plaintiff knows of his physical injury and its cause." While the limitations period starts when the injury and its cause are discovered, even if the full extent or severity of the injury is not known, in certain circumstances the limitations period may commence later than the date of discovery; however, it does not begin any earlier than the date of the discovery of the injury and its cause, the Court of Appeals found.

Devbrow did not learn of his cancer diagnosis until October 21, 2005, or that the cancer had metastasized until December 16.

Thus, the appellate court held the expiration date for the statute of limitations was no earlier than October 21 and perhaps as late as December 16, 2005. Either way, Devbrow's lawsuit was timely filed within the two-year limitations period.

The Seventh Circuit rejected the defendants' position that Devbrow could have filed a suit for nominal or presumed damages earlier, even absent a physical injury; the appellate court noted that "[t]he claim asserted here involves an actual physical injury, not an abstract or intangible one." It further held that the continuing violation doctrine, which serves to extend the statute of limitations period in certain circumstances, was not applicable.

Accordingly, the district court's order was reversed and the case remanded for further proceedings. See: Devbrow v. Kalu, 705 F.3d 765 (7th Cir. 2013). Following remand, the district court denied the defendants' motions for summary judgment in December 2013. The case is scheduled for trial on March 24, 2014. ■

Criminal Background Checks Criticized for Incorrect Data, Racial Discrimination

by Derek Gilna

A JULY 2013 STUDY BY THE NATIONAL Employment Law Project (NELP) found that widespread errors in FBI arrest data – which is increasingly relied upon by employers conducting criminal background checks – has reached alarming proportions. According to NELP staff attorney Madeline Neighly, the FBI records used for background checks “might be considered the gold standard, but these records are a mess.”

Part of the problem stems from the fact that the FBI is processing almost 17 million criminal background checks annually, or six times more than a decade ago. NELP reported that as many as 50% of the records compiled by the FBI, which constitute the largest database of criminal records in the nation, may be inaccurate or incomplete – resulting in serious economic hardships, especially for minority job applicants.

One reason for the inaccuracies is that background checks are quick to include arrests and criminal charges but much slower to show dismissals, not-guilty findings, expungements, felonies reduced to misdemeanors and other dispositions of criminal proceedings. The FBI acts as a clearinghouse for state agencies that supply arrest and criminal record data, which is collected and incorporated into background checks disseminated to authorized third parties.

Unfortunately, the FBI apparently lacks the resources to verify the accuracy of the data being supplied to potential employers, resulting in the undeserved rejection of many otherwise qualified job applicants.

Other problems with background checks are attributable to private companies that compile criminal record information from public databases, using software that often fails to distinguish between people with the same or similar names, or those who are victims of identity theft. [See: PLN, May 2013, p.34].

Further complicating the situation is the fact that applicants rejected due to inaccurate background records are disproportionately black or Hispanic, raising the possibility of racial discrimination. According to a 2010 report issued by the U.S.

Department of Justice, in approximately half the states up to 40% of criminal records were missing final dispositions. Backlogs in updating this data varied from state to state, sometimes taking up to 18 months.

Although the FBI cautions in its background checks that job applicants should be provided an opportunity to challenge or correct their records, that does not always occur. Instead, the burden falls on the applicant to prove his or her innocence. When potential employees are given a copy of the faulty background information and a meaningful opportunity to challenge inaccuracies, they are often able to correct the errors.

One example of the ordeal faced by job applicants rejected due to incorrect criminal background data is the plight of seaport workers, who are required by the Transportation Security Administration to pass an FBI background check. More than 120,000 applications for seaport workers have been rejected since 2007, but applicants were successful in 94% of the cases where they filed appeals or sought waivers.

As another example, the Department of Commerce’s 2010 census required the hiring of vast numbers of people, and 4 million job applications were received. Of those, a quarter were rejected as a result of FBI background checks. A lawsuit filed in April 2010 alleges that applicants had only a month to disprove the negative reports, which disproportionately discriminated against blacks and Hispanics. If certified, the class of eligible claimants is estimated to number over 850,000. The district court denied the Department of Commerce’s motion to dismiss on March 22, 2012, and the case remains pending. See: Houser v. Blank, U.S.D.C. (S.D. NY), Case No. 1:10-cv-03105-FM.

In its July 2013 report, NELP advocated for a more equitable appeal process when incorrect information is included in criminal background checks, which would give rejected job applicants at least two months after they are apprised of the reason for the rejection to submit evidence to dispute faulty background information.

ing impact on workers, especially workers of color who are disproportionately impacted by the criminal justice system. There is a solution to this problem that would immediately result in less job-loss and financial hardship: the FBI must ensure that records are accurate and complete prior to being released for employment and licensing decisions,” NELP concluded.

Additionally, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) has grown concerned in recent years with possible racial discrimination due to the increased use of criminal background checks, and the agency issued new guidance to employers on that issue in April 2012. [See: PLN, June 2012, p.20]. Approximately 86% of employers use background checks during the hiring process, according to a 2012 survey by the Society for Human Resource Management.

“Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 prohibits discrimination against job applicants and employees on account of their race,” said EEOC Chairwoman Jacqueline A. Berrien. “Since issuing its first written policy guidance in the 1980s regarding the use of arrest and conviction records in employment decisions, the EEOC has advised employers that under certain circumstances, their use of that information to deny employment opportunities could be at odds with Title VII.”

In June 2013, the EEOC took legal action against two large companies – Dolgencorp LLC, the parent corporation of discount retailer Dollar General, and a BMW factory in South Carolina – due to their hiring practices. According to a lawsuit filed by the EEOC, Dollar General violated the civil rights of two job applicants – incorrectly stating that one had a felony conviction based on a background check, while denying employment to another applicant who had disclosed a six-year-old conviction.

In another suit, the EEOC argued that BMW’s requirement that contract workers already employed at the company’s plant had to reapply for their jobs in 2008 resulted in a disproportionate percentage of minority employees being fired for failing background checks, absent individualized assessments. Both suits were brought under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act. See: EEOC v. Dolgencorp LLC, U.S.D.C. (N.D. Ill.), Case No. 1:13-cv-04307 and EEOC v. BMW Manufacturing Co. LLC, U.S.D.C. (D. SC), Case No. 7:13-cv-01583-HMH-JDA.

Predictably the EEOC faced intense criticism from business interests, with some saying the agency was trying to protect "former criminals." Todd McCracken, with the National Small Business Association, noted, "State and federal courts will allow potentially devastating tort lawsuits against businesses that hire felons who commit crimes at the workplace or in customers' homes. Yet the EEOC is threatening to launch lawsuits if they do not hire those same felons."

According to BMW spokesman Kenn Sparks, "BMW believes that it has complied with the letter and spirit of the law and will defend itself against the EEOC's allegations of race discrimination." Dollar General announced that its employment policies are "structured to foster a safe and healthy environment for its employees, its customers, and to protect its assets in a lawful, reasonable and nondiscriminatory manner."

Yet when rejecting job applicants with criminal records, Dollar General and BMW appear to be working at cross-purposes. Given the nation's enormous prison population and with around 637,000 prisoners being released each year, it is unwise on many levels to refuse to hire people who are otherwise qualified when employment is essential to help ex-offenders become law-abiding, tax-paying citizens.

Nine state Attorneys General sent a joint letter to the EEOC on July 24, 2013 in response to the agency's lawsuits against Dollar General and BMW, protesting the EEOC's enforcement actions related to criminal background checks. The Attorneys General called the suits "misguided and a quintessential example of gross federal overreach."

leging discrimination due to criminal background checks that disproportionately impact minorities are not easy wins, however, even for the EEOC. On August 9, 2013, a federal district court in Maryland ruled against the agency in a case similar to those filed against Dollar General and BMW, finding that an event-marketing firm, Freeman Co., did not discriminate against minority job applicants by conducting criminal background and credit checks during the hiring process. In dismissing the case, the court noted that the EEOC itself uses background checks. See: EEOC v. Freeman Co., U.S.D.C. (D. Md.), Case No. 8:09-cv-02573-RWT; 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 112368.

In November 2013 the EEOC was sued by the State of Texas, which argued that the agency's guidance related to criminal background checks limits "the prerogative of employers, including Texas, to exclude convicted felons from employment." The EEOC filed a motion to dismiss on January 27, 2014, which remains pending. See: State of Texas v. EEOC, U.S.D.C. (N.D. Texas), Case No. 5:13-cv-00255-C.

Although there is some evidence that society's view of former prisoners is becoming less punitive, the reality is that ex-offenders still have a very difficult time finding jobs that pay a living wage. A 2003 study by sociologist Devah Pager found that being a minority increased the negative impact of a criminal history, in that white job applicants with criminal records were more likely to be hired than black applicants with similar records. It is unlikely that much has changed over the past decade.

The EEOC stated in its lawsuits against Dollar General and BMW that the companies used criminal background checks in a manner that had a "disparate impact" on minority job applicants, who are more likely to have criminal histories.

Yet barely mentioned in the studies related to background checks and criminal records, or in the EEOC's enforcement actions, is the fact that the underlying reason for many of the problems related to ex-offenders finding employment is our nation's policy of mass incarceration. Around 2.2 million people are incarcerated in prisons and jails at any given time; those released will all have criminal records and, thus, a paucity of job prospects.

According to a research study published in January 2014, 49% of black males, 44% of Hispanic males and 38% of white males are arrested by age 23, which can have a significant impact on their ability to find future employment.

"Criminal records that show up in [background] searches can impede employment, reduce access to housing, thwart admission to and financing for higher education and affect civic and volunteer activities such as voting or adoption. They also can damage personal and family relationships," noted University of South Carolina criminology professor Robert Brame, the lead author of the study.

Enforcement actions by the EEOC, "Ban the Box" initiatives to remove criminal history questions from job applications, federal legislation – such as the Fairness and Accuracy in Criminal Background Checks Act introduced by U.S. Rep. Bobby Scott in July 2013 – and increased awareness about the re-entry needs of released prisoners can help alleviate problems related to background checks and employment for ex-offenders. Ban the Box legislation has been enacted in ten states and dozens of cities, and some private employers, notably Target, no longer ask about criminal records on their job applications. [See: PLN, Sept. 2011, p.32].

But more is needed. Specifically, adding

"prior incarceration status" to the list of protected classes – which include race, ethnicity, gender, religion, age and disability – that employers may not legally consider when hiring job applicants would go a long way to help level the employment playing field for ex-offenders. That, however, is a solution unlikely to happen anytime soon. ■

Former Kansas Prisoner's Sexual Misconduct Suit Overcomes Qualified Immunity

THE TENTH CIRCUIT HAS AFFIRMED the denial of qualified immunity to a warden in a civil rights action that alleged he created and allowed a policy or culture of sexual misconduct and failed to take reasonable measures to abate that culture of sexual misconduct at a Kansas women's prison.

The lawsuit was brought by former Topoka Correctional Facility (TCF) prisoner Tracy Keith. Her suit, filed in federal district court, alleged that while she participated in a vocational training program at TCF her instructor, Ananastacio Gallardo, engaged in sexual misconduct with her in October 2007. Keith became pregnant as a result, and her pregnancy was terminated. [See: PLN, May 2010, p.18]. Gallardo pleaded guilty in June 2008 to a charge of unlawful sexual relations and two charges of trafficking contraband. He was placed on two years' probation and required to register as a sex offender.

Keith filed her civil rights suit in May 2011; she attached to the complaint a 2010 Kansas Legislative Post Audit Report that contained multiple findings regarding sexual misconduct at TCF. The district court granted qualified immunity to all the defendants except Gallardo and former TCF Warden Richard D. Koerner. Koerner appealed.

The Tenth Circuit noted that a supervisory official could be held liable under the claims alleged by Keith, stating, "it is clearly established that a prison official's deliberate indifference to sexual abuse by prison employees violates the Eighth Amendment.... Such a violation occurs where 'the official knows of and disregards an excessive risk to inmate health or safety,' and there is an affirmative link between the constitutional deprivation and the supervisor's actions."

The appellate court cited four reasons why the case could not be subject to a motion to dismiss. First, Keith pointed to reports of at least 54 incidents of sexual misconduct and 33 incidents of undue familiarity involving staff and prisoners at TCF between 2005 and 2009, and to a 2005 lawsuit over strip searches at TCF, suggesting that Koerner had knowledge of those incidents. Next, she pointed to the Post Audit Report's findings of inconsistent staff discipline, failure to investigate and failure to terminate employees in response to substantiated complaints of sexual misconduct and undue familiarity.

Third, she alleged facts that tended to show the existence of structural policy issues that contributed to sexual misconduct at TCF. On that point, the Post Audit Report noted that "policy decisions – particularly decisions not to address known problems with the vocational training program and the insufficient use of cameras to monitor inmates and staff – made TCF 'ripe for staff misconduct.'" Finally, Keith alleged that a lack of training programs tailored to the all-female population at TCF contributed to sexual misconduct at the facility.

The Court of Appeals concluded that those allegations, which must be accepted as true when considering a motion to dismiss, were sufficient to defeat a grant of qualified immunity to the defendants. The district court's judgment was therefore affirmed and the case remanded for further proceedings, where it remains pending. See: Keith v. Kerner, 707 F.3d 1185 (10th Cir. 2013).

In February 2013, Gallardo was sentenced in an unrelated federal prosecution to five years in prison and five years on supervised release for possessing firearms during a drug-related crime that involved distribution of methamphetamine. On April 5, 2013, the Kansas Court of Appeals held that Gallardo was not required to register as a sex offender as part of his state conviction for unlawful sexual relations. See: State v. Gallardo, 48 Kan. App. 2d 756, 300 P.3d 89 (Kan. Ct. App. 2013). ■

Ninth Circuit Upholds Six-Day Contraband Watch Conditions

A DIVIDED PANEL OF THE NINTH Circuit Court of Appeals has held that California prison officials are entitled to qualified immunity on a prisoner's claim that the conditions of a six-day contraband watch – which included 24-hour lighting, the absence of a mattress and extensive bodily restraints – violated the Eighth Amendment's ban on cruel and unusual punishment.

On April 30, 2002, shortly after Philisa Richard, the fiancée of CSP-Sacramento prisoner Rex Chappell, admitted she was the owner of a discarded hairpiece – which had tested positive for cocaine residue – found during a search of the area around the prison visiting room, guards searched Chappell's cell and discovered methamphetamine. He was then put on contraband watch to determine whether he had ingested or secreted any other drugs.

Chappell was placed in two pairs of underwear, one worn normally and the other backwards, with the underwear taped at the waist and thighs. He was also dressed in two jumpsuits, one worn normally and the other backwards, with the suits taped at the thighs, ankles, waist and upper arms to close off any openings. He was then put in ankle shackles and a waist chain. Finally, he was placed in a surveillance cell with no furniture other than a bed without a mattress. There, chained to the bed and under constant bright lights so staff could observe him, Chappell was forced to "eat [his] food like a dog."

After having three bowel movements that did not reveal any drugs, he was released from contraband watch on May 6, 2002.

Chappell subsequently filed suit under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 alleging various constitutional violations. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendant prison officials on all but two of Chappell's claims – that the contraband watch constituted cruel and unusual punishment and that his due process rights were violated when he had neither received notice of nor an opportunity to rebut the charges against him before he was placed on contraband watch.

On interlocutory appeal, the Ninth Circuit reversed the district court's denial of summary judgment on those claims, holding the law was not clearly established as to whether the conditions of the contraband watch to which Chappell was subjected in 2002 violated the Eighth Amendment, or whether those conditions constituted an "atypical and significant hardship" sufficient to trigger due process protections.

In dissent, Circuit Judge Marsha S. Berzon expressed the view that a reasonable prison official would have known that, in combination, the 24-hour bright lights, absence of a mattress and extensive restraints risked depriving Chappell of sleep in violation of the Eighth Amendment, and that Chappell therefore should have had an opportunity to prove to a jury that the defendants were deliberately indifferent to the risk of physical or psychological harm created by the conditions of his confinement while on contraband watch. See: Chappell v. Mandeville, 706 F.3d 1052 (9th Cir. 2013). ■

Reflections on the No More Jails Campaign in Champaign County, Illinois

by James Kilgore

WHEN WE BEGAN OUR CAMPAIGN TO stop jail construction in Champaign County, Illinois in early 2012, I thought we were doomed. The grand plan to spend $20 million on this project seemed like a done deal. The Sheriff was driving the initiative; the leading lights in the County Board seemed to think jail construction was the only prudent course. Yet, nearly two years later, we have a very different scenario. The 2014 budget for Champaign County doesn't include a single cent for jail construction. In fact, the county has allocated more than $200,000 in new money for social programs aimed at keeping people out of jail. In a county of slightly more than 200,000 residents, this is an important start.

How did this happen? The answer is simple – a campaign of ordinary people, led by a core group from Champaign-Urbana Citizens for Peace and Justice (CUCPJ), turned the situation around. This campaign is proof that action by people at the grass-roots level can make a difference.

Here I want to briefly reflect on the key measures we took to make our campaign a success. But I also want to issue a word of warning: The campaign is not yet over. We are actually just beginning a much longer and more complicated process of changing the criminal legal system in this county from the “lock ‘em up and throw away the key” approach that has dominated not only Champaign County but much of the country for the last three decades.

Background to No More Jails

Champaign County has two jails, one in downtown Urbana and another at Brookens in East Urbana. The impetus for the proposed jail expansion came from the supposed deterioration of the downtown facility, built in 1980. By 2012, local officials as well as an inspection team from the National Institute of Corrections declared that the downtown jail was in “deplorable” condition, actually beyond repair. They wanted to close it down and bring in the construction crews.

As noted above, in those early days they seemed destined to get their way. The sole voice in opposition was Board member and CUCPJ leader Carol Ammons, now an Urbana City Council member. Gradually a core of us rallied around her and formed what would ultimately be “No More Jails.” Our foundation was the decade of work CUCPJ had done on social justice issues, particularly focusing on race and the criminal legal system. CUCPJ's campaigns against the use of Tasers by police, for jail phone justice and the mobilizations in response to the police killing of African-American youth Kiwane Carrington in 2009 formed a core of awareness and experience on which we could build.

Another precursor was a reading group based on Michelle Alexander's The New Jim Crow, in which many of us participated. Engaging with Michelle's book helped us to see the plans for new jail cells in our county as the local face of the racialized mass incarceration that she described so vividly. We wanted no part of it. We began to meet regularly and attend the County Board meetings. Our journey had begun.

Keys to Success

Number One: Standing Firm on the Basics

As I look back, I think there were five main reasons we managed to gain some measure of success. First, and most importantly, we stood firm on two principles: no new jail cells and the need for community participation in decision-making. When Board members and law enforcement came with explanations about how we needed a jail to protect the people inside, how we needed it because women and the mentally ill deserved better facilities, how having one jail instead of two would save the county money, we refused to budge. We correctly identified the key issue – the priority was to spend more money on ways to keep people out of jail, not ways to make people more comfortable inside their cells or make the system run more smoothly. We were also adamant that this process should be public. We were confident that few people in our county really wanted to spend their tax dollars on jail cells. Our views were borne out: through the entire time of the campaign not a single person ever came to the County Board to speak in favor of building the jail.

Number Two: Adapting to Change

Though we stood firm, we recognized that as the campaign progressed, the terrain changed. We began by attending Board meetings on a weekly basis and making presentations during public participation. Though we got a chilly reception at first, after a while some County Board members began to listen. We responded to their newfound openness to dialog and altered our tactics. Instead of opposing their every move, we found ways to work with them to shape the debate and decision-making process.

As a result, instead of hiring an architect and a construction firm, the county decided to contract a consultant to do a needs assessment – not only of the jail building issue, but of the criminal justice system as a whole. We then studied the firms that applied for the consultancy and advocated for the one we thought would be most likely to support an alternative course. When our favorite was selected, we connected with their director. We organized public meetings for him to dialog with local residents. We communicated with him individually, lobbying for our alternative vision to inform his report. We assisted him where possible in gathering information and in getting a better understanding of how the local system worked. In the end, he wrote a report which put jail building on the back burner and prioritized the kinds of alternatives to incarceration which we had been advocating all along. Our engagement with his work and his willingness to open the door to our ideas was crucial in influencing the County Board's final decisions.

We also pushed for another process, one that involved more public participation in the decision-making. This resulted in the Board setting up a Community Justice Task Force to develop proposals for alternatives to incarceration. Two CUCPJ members ended up on the Task Force and played a leading role in its operations and its lengthy final report of June 2013.

Once these processes got under way, we developed working relationships with various board members. We identified our allies and those that were undecided, and held one-on-one meetings with them to discuss relevant issues. Gradually we made our dedication and knowledge apparent to them. Several members who were hostile to us initially began to listen.

Number Three: Research, Research, Research

We did our homework and became the experts on the issue. We spent hours building a profile of who was incarcerated in our county – demonstrating that our jail's cells were teeming with people who didn't belong there – those with traffic tickets, mental illness, substance abuse problems, women with non-violent charges. Most importantly, we identified the seriousness of the racial disparity in our jail population. We found that consistently more than half those in the jail were African-American in a county with a 13% Black population. This was a key point in exposing the pitfalls of building new jail cells – that ultimately they would end up caging more Black youth. We also uncovered the ways in which incarceration specifically impacted women in the jail, contributing to the separation of families and facilitating the unnecessary loss of child custody among parents in the jail population. All of this served to expose the irrationality of mass incarceration at the ground level.

We added a financial dimension to our research as well, uncovering how the county was spending taxpayers' money and emphasizing the need to reallocate more of the $4.6 million collected every year in Public Safety Sales Tax. At the time, the county was spending 95% of that money on bond repayment for criminal justice construction and support for law enforcement. In pressing for a change in the allocation of these revenues, we encouraged a new framing of the idea of public safety. For us and for much of the community, public safety was about ensuring people's access to healthcare, housing, employment, education and treatment, not simply increasing the number of police and jail cells.

Besides analyzing the local situation, we researched trends and successful changes in other communities across the country and brought them into our criminal justice debate. We spoke about prison closures in New York, the blocking of a jail construction plan in Bloomington, Indiana and a re-entry program in Richmond, California. This helped Board members realize that they would not be alone if they opted for changes.

Number Four: Network, Network, Network

We sought allies. We formed alliances with constituencies who would be affected by new jail cells. Groups like the National Alliance on Mental Illness (NAMI) and the local Immigration Forum played a vital role in convincing Board members that opposition to jail construction wasn't just coming from a small cohort of "fringe elements" in the community. Other local organizations from various quarters added their own contribution to the campaign along the way: the ACLU; Against War, Racism and Exploitation (AWARE); the Campus Labor Coalition; Citizens with Conviction; the Friends Meeting; the Graduate Employees Organization (GEO); the League of Women Voters; the Ministerial Alliance; the NAACP; New Covenant; the North End Breakfast Club and the Planners' Network.

We further broadened our base by reaching out to the general public through door-to-door surveys, petitions, online appeals, building a social media presence and database, tabling at events like the Farmers' Market and C-U Days, holding public forums on key issues and using the airwaves of our local community radio station WEFT, especially the Saturday morning "Higher Ground" segment. One of our biggest successes was linking up with a local theater co-op to stage a showing of the anti-Drug War film, The House I Live In. We filled the theater to capacity – more than 300 people, including three County Board members, and used the opportunity to inform people about our campaign.

We also extended our networks beyond Champaign County, connecting with other groups in other parts of the country who had organized campaigns similar to ours and sharing experiences. These links were enhanced by joining Nation Inside, a national social media network focused on criminal justice issues. Their support gave us national exposure as well as a web-based platform to post messages, videos and other information about our work.

We used these connections to engineer a big final push as the time drew near for the County Board to vote on their next steps. We contacted our friends in academia and professional circles and got them to email, phone or meet face-to-face with their Board members. We upgraded our database and did phone banking to bring people out to Board meetings and mobilize them to communicate with their Board members. We printed lime green t-shirts with "Build Programs Not Jails" on the front and wore them en masse to Board meetings. We bombarded the Board Chair and the Chair of Finance with hundreds of postcards signed by our supporters made from lime green card stock, urging them to vote for alternatives to jail construction. We mobilized high-profile national campaigners like Michelle Alexander to sign onto a letter to the County Board praising their efforts to consider alternatives and urging them to stay away from further jail construction.

Number Five: Mass Incarceration is Always About Race

We kept the issue of racial disparity at the center of our campaign. We found new ways to repeat a message that many Board members, law enforcement gatekeepers and much of the public simply did not want to hear – that we had a problem of racial profiling in our criminal justice system that required serious action, and building jail cells was only going to make it worse. We made sure that the Board knew this issue was not going to go away.

Next Steps

THESE ARE SOME OF THE REASONS WHY we were able to stop the construction of jail cells. I wish I could say that we can now rest on our laurels, that the battle is over and our county is inevitably headed down a new path. But social change doesn't work like that. It is an uneven process.

Already elements in the judiciary are pushing back – refusing to implement some of the recommendations of the needs assessment consultant and the Community Justice Task Force. No doubt as some of the new programs experience growing pains, others will want to turn the clock back and return to the old ways. We need to remain mobilized to make sure this doesn't happen. We have accomplished a lot in this campaign, but we have only just begun the journey to change how criminal justice operates in our county. Moreover, we have to push harder to move more resources across to housing, job creation, mental health and family support in order to eradicate poverty and rebuild the communities that have been torn apart by mass incarceration. There is still a long way to travel. ■

Ninth Circuit Questions Constitutionality of Requiring Jail Prisoners to Wear Pink Underwear

by Matt Clarke

ON MARCH 7, 2012, THE NINTH CIRCUIT Court of Appeals issued a decision in which it questioned the constitutionality of a Maricopa County, Arizona jail policy that requires male pretrial detainees who have not been convicted of a crime to wear pink underwear. The appellate court did not specifically rule on the issue, as it had not been presented to the court due to erroneous limitations on the evidence introduced at trial.

Eric Vogel, 36, suffered from mental illness that caused him to be delusional. He lived with his mother and, other than attending schools in his youth, had left home only two or three times as an adult to attend funerals. The windows of his house were covered with blankets and tape to prevent anyone from looking in.

On November 12, 2001, Vogel wandered away from his home. A police officer, responding to a report of a suspected burglar in the area, stopped him. He struggled with the officer, shouting "Kill me." A second officer arrived and Vogel told him that he needed to see the president. The officers said they would take him to the president, but instead delivered him to the Maricopa County Jail where he was charged with assaulting a police officer.

During the booking process, a classification officer interviewed Vogel and placed a psychiatric hold on him. He was held overnight in an isolation cell with a large glass window that allowed staff and other prisoners to see him at all times.

A psychological counselor examined Vogel the next morning and, noting that he was disoriented, paranoid and psychotic, determined that he required psychiatric care and ordered him transferred to the jail's inpatient psychiatric unit. That afternoon, guards told Vogel he must change into jail clothing, including pink underwear and pink slippers. He refused.

Four guards held Vogel down while a fifth forcibly changed his clothes. During this "dress-out" procedure, Vogel shouted for help and yelled that he was being raped. All of the guards involved in the dress-out knew he was being transferred to the inpatient psychiatric unit.

A week later, Vogel's mother bailed him out. Several weeks after his release from jail, Vogel was a passenger in his mother's car when she was in a minor accident. He had been told there was a warrant out for his arrest for spitting on a guard during the dress-out, and that he might be returned to jail. Informed that the police were on their way, he ran four or five miles to get away. He died of acute cardiac arrhythmia the next day. [See: PLN, Jan. 2011, p.16].

Vogel's estate sued Maricopa County and Sheriff Joe Arpaio, alleging violations of Vogel's federal civil rights and state torts. At trial, the district court refused to allow testimony by Vogel's relatives that he believed he had been raped during the dress-out procedure and that the pink underwear was forced on him to feminize him and prepare him to be abused by guards during a sex party. The court also declined to allow expert testimony that could have linked the stress Vogel experienced during the dress-out to his fatal cardiac arrhythmia, and to show that people with schizophrenia were at increased risk of cardiac arrhythmia. The jury found in favor of the defendants and Vogel's estate appealed.

The Ninth Circuit held that the district court's rulings were erroneous under either the abuse of discretion or de novo standard of review and were highly prejudicial, cutting out the heart of the estate's case. The testimony of Vogel's relatives was not offered to prove that he had been raped, but rather to show that he thought he had been raped and what his emotional state was as a result of that belief. The experts, who were excluded because their opinions were based upon the excluded testimony, should have been permitted to testify, the Court of Appeals held.

The district court also erred in refusing to allow the estate a rebuttal argument for no reason and without informing the estate before closing arguments began. The Ninth Circuit further noted that requiring male prisoners who have not been convicted of a crime to wear pink underwear and slippers may be a violation of due process, as it could be seen as punishment because it has no apparent connection to the safety and security of the jail but rather appears to be intended to humiliate. If so, that practice would violate the due process clause by punishing people who have not been convicted of a crime. No ruling was made on this issue, however, because the erroneous evidentiary rulings by the lower court prevented it being developed at trial.

nificance is selected for jail underwear, it is difficult to believe that the choice of color was random," the appellate court wrote. "The County offers no penalogical reason, indeed no explanation whatsoever for its jail's odd choice. Given the cultural context, it is a fair inference that the color is chosen to symbolize a loss of masculine identity and power, to stigmatize the male prisoners as feminine."

The case was reversed and remanded to the district court, and the jury verdict and judgment were vacated. One panel judge filed a dissenting opinion that was longer than the majority opinion. See: Wagner v. County of Maricopa, 673 F.3d 977 (9th Cir. 2012), rehearing and rehearing en banc denied. The Ninth Circuit issued three amended rulings, most recently on February 13, 2013 [see: Wagner v. County of Maricopa, 706 F.3d 942 (9th Cir. 2013)], though the outcome remained the same. The U.S. Supreme Court denied the defendants' petition for writ of certiorari in March 2013.

The case remains pending on remand.

Pennsylvania Jail Official Indicted for Groping Co-workers

by Christopher Zoukis

RONALD EDWARD LENSBOUER, 44, THE Chief Corrections Officer at a jail in Somerset County, Pennsylvania, faces charges of indecently assaulting two female guards at the facility.

According to court records, Lensbouer was charged on June 5, 2013 in two separate cases with four misdemeanor counts each of indecent assault and harassment, and two summary charges of harassment – all misdemeanors.

An affidavit of probable cause filed in both cases stated the guards had to fight and struggle to free themselves from being groped by Lensbouer, their supervisor. Lensbouer had made lewd comments to both women from late 2010 through 2012. In separate incidents in December 2012, he allegedly placed his hands down each woman's pants while they worked in control rooms at the jail.

The same affidavit indicated that Lensbouer had confessed to the offenses during a May 7, 2013 interview with police. Borough Police Chief Randy Cox stated they were unable to take action on three other reports of similar misconduct by Lensbouer because the statute of limitations had expired.

County Commissioner Joe Betta said Lensbouer was suspended without pay. Betta expressed frustration that he had to push for months for an investigation, and that he didn't hear about the matter from jail administrators. "This should have been brought to our attention last year," he said.

Betta expressed gratitude to other jail guards who stood up for the women victimized by Lensbouer. "Unfortunately, there are a few [guards] who have the backbone of an amoeba," he said. "It's sad we had to work so long and hard to get something done."

Solitary Confinement's Invisible Scars

I spent more than five years of my sentence in "the box," for trivial violations. It's time we saw this casual abuse for what it is: torture.

by Five Oman Muallimm-ak

As kids, many of us imagine having superpowers. An avid comic book reader, I often imagined being invisible. I never thought I would actually experience it, but I did.

It wasn't in a parallel universe – although it often felt that way – but right here in the Empire State, my home. While serving time in New York's prisons, I spent 2,054 days in solitary and other forms of isolated confinement, out of sight and invisible to other human beings – and eventually, even to myself.

After only a short time in solitary, I felt all of my senses begin to diminish. There was nothing to see but gray walls. In New York's so-called special housing units, or SHUs, most cells have solid steel doors, and many do not have windows. You cannot even tape up pictures or photographs; they must be kept in an envelope. To fight the blankness, I counted bricks and measured the walls. I stared obsessively at the bolts on the door to my cell.

There was nothing to hear except empty, echoing voices from other parts of the prison. I was so lonely that I hallucinated words coming out of the wind. They sounded like whispers. Sometimes I smelled the paint on the wall, but more often I just smelled myself, revolted by my own scent.

There was no touch. My food was pushed through a slot. Doors were activated by buzzers, even the one that led to a literal cage directly outside of my cell for one hour per day of "recreation."

Even time had no meaning in the SHU. The lights were kept on for 24 hours. I often found myself wondering if an event I was recollecting had happened that morning or days before. I talked to myself. I began to get scared that the guards would come in and kill me and leave me hanging in the cell. Who would know if something happened to me? Just as I was invisible, so was the space I inhabited.

The very essence of life, I came to learn during those seemingly endless days, is human contact, and the affirmation of existence that comes with it. Losing that contact, you lose your sense of identity. You become nothing.

Everyone knows that prison is supposed to take away your freedom. But solitary doesn't just confine your body; it kills your soul.

Yet neither a judge nor a jury of my peers handed down this sentence to me. Each of the tormented 23 hours per day that I spent in a bathroom-sized room, without any contact with the outside world, was determined by prison staff.

Anyone lacking familiarity with our state prison system would probably guess I must have been a pretty scary, out-of-control prisoner. But I never committed one act of violence during my entire sentence. Instead, a series of "tickets," or disciplinary write-ups for prison rule violations, were punished with a total of more than five years in "the box."

In New York, guards give out tickets like penny candy. During my nine years in prison I received an endless stream of tickets, each one more absurd than the last. When I tried to use artwork to stay sane, I was ticketed for having too many pencils. Another time, I had too many postage stamps.

One day I ate an entire apple – including the core – because I was starving for lack of nutrition. I received a ticket for eating the core since apple seeds contain arsenic, as spelled out in the prison handbook. The next time I received an apple, fearful of another ticket, I simply left it on the tray. I received a ticket for "refusing to eat."

For the five years I spent in the box, I received insulin shots for my diabetes by extending my arm through the food slot in the cell's door ("therapy" for prisoners with mental illness is often conducted this way, as well). One day, the person who gave me the shot yanked roughly on my arm through the small opening and I instinctively pulled back. This earned me another ticket for "refusing medical attention," adding additional time to my solitary sentence.

My case is far from unusual. A 2012 study by the New York Civil Liberties Union found that five out of six of the 13,000 SHU sentences handed out each year are for nonviolent misbehavior, rather than violent acts. This brutal approach to discipline means that New York isolates its prisoners at rates well above the national average.

On any given day, some 4,300 men, women and children are in isolated confinement in the state, many for months or years. Those with more serious prison offenses have been held in solitary for 20 years or more.

Using this form of punishment is particularly absurd for minor rule infractions. But in truth, no one should be subjected to the kind of extreme isolation that is practiced in New York's prisons today. I have no doubt that what is going on in prisons all over our state is torture. Many national and international human rights groups – including UN Special Rapporteur on Torture Juan E. Méndez – concur. Yet it continues, unseen and largely ignored by the public.

The scars that isolated confinement leaves behind may be invisible, too, but they are no less painful or permanent than physical scars. Even now that I am out of prison, I suffer major psychological consequences from those years in isolation.

I know that I have irreparable memory damage. I can hardly sleep. I have a short temper. I do not like people to touch me. I cannot listen to music or watch television or sports. I am only beginning to recover my ability to talk on the phone. I no longer feel connected to people.

Even though I am a free man now, I often feel as though I remain invisible, going through the motions of life. Feeling tormented by a punishment that has ended is a strange and unnerving anguish. But there are thousands like me, and until New Yorkers choose to bear witness to the soul-destroying torture taking place in their own backyards, our suffering, too, will remain invisible. ■

Editor's Note: A bill introduced by New York state Assemblyman Jeffrion L. Aubry and state Senator Bill Perkins in January 2014, the consecutive days within a 60-day period. The Assembly bill is A8588-2013 and the Senate bill is S6466-2013.

Lawsuit, Whistleblower Allege Rape by Guards at New Mexico Prison

ALAWSUIT FILED IN MAY 2012, ALLEGING sexual abuse at the Central New Mexico Correctional Facility (CNMCF) in Los Lunas, compelled a retired prison guard to come forward and blow the whistle on several other officers, including one already accused of raping a prisoner.

The retired guard, whose identity was withheld by New Mexico TV station KOB Channel 4, called CNMCF captain Kenneth Carrejo a "pervert" who "liked to get the inmates one-on-one back in the infirmary."

"That's all he's ever been," the whistleblower said. "I would tell that to his face."

A lawsuit against Carrejo alleged that he handcuffed a male prisoner to furniture in an office and raped him. Carrejo also allegedly threatened to kill the prisoner if he reported the abuse. According to the suit, CNMCF warden Anthony Romero called in the state police to investigate and interview the victim; at least one of the state police officers who responded was Carrejo's brother.

"Obviously had we known that he was this guy's brother, we wouldn't have sent him because of the big conflict of interest there," said State Police Lt. Robert McDonald.

According to the whistleblower interviewed by KOB, several guards at CNMCF forced prisoners to have sex with them. One prisoner in O-unit was allegedly "gang-banged" by guards, "who thought nothing to allow other inmates to gang-bang him" as well.

The retired guard also said he was confident that wardens and other top-level prison officials at the facility knew of the rapes and sexual abuse, "...unless they were deaf, dumb and stupid and blind."

KOB reported that attempts to interview New Mexico corrections department officials and a former warden at CNMCF were unsuccessful, and information released by the department was vague and evasive.

The lawsuit against Carrejo, filed by prisoner Kenneth Morgan, claimed that Carrejo had orally and anally raped him and that he had saved DNA evidence from the sexual assaults. The case settled in December 2013; citing state law, the New Mexico Risk Management Division declined to provide the amount of the settlement. See: Morgan v. Carrejo, U.S.D.C. (D. N.M.), Case No. 1:12-cv-00583-KG-LAM.

Carrejo, who retired in 2011, was indicted in August 2012 in Valencia County district court on four counts of criminal sexual penetration. He has proclaimed his innocence and is scheduled to go to trial in February 2014.

"We will seek justice in all criminal matters that come to our attention, regardless of whether the perpetrator is an inmate, offender, or staff member," said Corrections Secretary Gregg Marcantel.

Marcantel cleared Warden Romero following an internal investigation, finding he did not obstruct or interfere with an investigation into sexual abuse at CNMCF. "I would consider him exonerated," Commissioner Marcantel stated. ■

Ninth Circuit: Immigration Detainees Must be Afforded Opportunity to Challenge Continued Detention after Six Months

ON APRIL 16, 2013, THE NINTH CIRCUIT Court of Appeals affirmed a district court's grant of preliminary injunctive relief to immigration detainees in Southern California, affording them an opportunity to challenge their continued detention before an Immigration Judge after six months.

On any given day, Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) detains over 33,000 immigrants while they await the conclusion of administrative and judicial proceedings that will determine whether or not they may lawfully remain in the United States. ICE's Los Angeles Field Office alone oversees the detention of more than 2,000 immigration detainees.

Alejandro Rodriguez and five other Southern California detainees filed suit challenging their prolonged detention, arguing that if they were not given an opportunity to seek review, in a neutral forum, of the government's justification for their continued imprisonment, "grave constitutional concerns" would result.

The district court certified the case as a class-action consisting of non-citizens within the Central District of California detained for longer than six months pursuant to one of two general immigration detention statutes. The court then entered a preliminary injunction requiring the government to provide each member of the class with a bond hearing before an Immigration Judge with the power to grant their release – subject to reasonable conditions of supervision – unless the government demonstrates by clear and convincing evidence that continued detention is justified because the detainee poses a danger to the community or is a flight risk.

The Ninth Circuit affirmed on appeal, holding that while the government is authorized by statute to detain deportable immigrants, the statutes at issue, 8 U.S.C. § 1226(c) (providing for the detention of certain criminal immigrants) and § 1225(b) (providing for the detention of arriving immigrants), could not permissibly be read to authorize prolonged detention without an individualized determination of dangerousness or flight risk.

Relying on Ninth Circuit precedent, the Court of Appeals held that, as a general matter, detention is considered "prolonged" when it has lasted six months and is expected to continue more than minimally beyond that point. The appellate court noted that six months is more than sufficient time needed to conduct removal proceedings, which typically last less than 50 days on average. See: Rodriguez v. Robbins, 715 F.3d 1127 (9th Cir. 2013). ■

Restitution Not Owed for Arrest Costs, West Virginia Court Holds

by Derek Gilna

PETITIONER MICHAEL JOHN MCGILL appealed his December 2010 state conviction for escape from home confinement while on bail and the sentencing judge's order that he pay $8,261.56 in "restitution to the State for costs associated with apprehending him following his unauthorized departure from home confinement."

According to a decision by the Supreme Court of Appeals, "A group of thirty-seven law enforcement officers identified in the record as members of the West Virginia and Federal Fugitive Task Force undertook the recapture of Petitioner when it was discovered that he had fled West Virginia.... It took nine days for the task force to recapture Petitioner."

The Court disagreed with McGill's argument that he was on pretrial bail and not in formal custody of the county sheriff as part of the bail arrangement, noting that his crime of escape was statutory under West Virginia Code §§ 61-5-10 and 61-3-13. The Court did, however, concur that "the statute authorizing restitution does not contemplate the inclusion of the State as a victim of crime. The State agrees and confesses error."

West Virginia's Victim Protection Act of 1984, §§ 61-11A-1 to 8 provides for restitution to victims of crime, but the trial court failed to heed the language of the statute that relates to bodily injury of individual victims, costs related to medical care and reimbursement for stolen or damaged property. "Clearly neither damage to society as a whole nor the cost of apprehension and investigation incurred by the government apprehending criminals are contemplated by this statutory language," the Supreme Court of Appeals wrote.

Rather, to recover pursuant to the restitution statute, the victim must be a "direct victim" under the doctrine of State v. Lucas, 201 W.Va. 271, 496 S.E. 2d 221 (W. Va. 1997).

The Court affirmed McGill's underlying conviction but reversed as to the restitution order, and remanded the case to the lower court for further proceedings. See: State of West Virginia v. McGill, 230 W.Va. 85, 736 S.E.2d 85 (W. Va. 2012). ■

Discretionary Immunity Dismissal of Ohio Prisoner's Negligence Claims Reversed

ON MARCH 12, 2013, THE OHIO COURT of Appeals overturned an earlier discretionary immunity decision and reversed a lower court's dismissal of a prisoner's negligence claims on the basis of discretionary immunity.

Ohio Department of Rehabilitation and Correction (ODRC) prisoner Ron Foster suffers from various health problems, including a heart condition, a back injury and balance issues.

Dr. Asche, an ODRC employee at the Hocking Correctional Facility, issued a lower-bunk restriction for Foster from August 17, 2009 to September 2, 2009. When he re-evaluated Foster on September 3, however, Dr. Asche did not renew the lower-bunk restriction.

Foster was moved to a top bunk on September 3, 2009 and fell from it later the same day. He claimed he suffered serious injuries as a result of the fall – including the "total loss of use of his right arm."

Foster filed a state court negligence action against the ODRC in September 2011, seeking damages of $25,000. The trial court granted the ODRC's motion for summary judgment, finding that Foster's claims failed as a matter of law because prison officials were entitled to discretionary immunity under Brown v. Dept. of Rehab. & Corr., 2011 Ohio 3652 (Ohio Ct. App. 2011).

Foster appealed and the Ohio Court of Appeals reversed, overturning Brown and following the state Supreme Court's decisions in Reynolds v. State Div. of Parole and Community Servs., 14 Ohio St.3d 68, 471 N.E.2d 776 (Ohio 1984) and Semadini v. Ohio Dept. of Transp., 75 Ohio St.3d 128, 661 N.E.2d 1013 (Ohio 1996).

"Many state employees are called upon to exercise a high degree of discretion while working," the appellate court wrote. "Were we to find that discretionary immunity applies every time a state employee exercises discretion in performing his or her job, we would be vastly expanding the scope of the discretionary immunity doctrine while simultaneously limiting the scope of the state's waiver of sovereign immunity from liability as established by the Court of Claims Act. R.C. 2743.02(A)(1)."

Following Reynolds, the Court of Appeals noted that discretionary immunity is available under Ohio law only upon a showing of "the exercise of a high degree of official judgment or discretion as to an executive or planning function involving the making of a basic policy decision."

The ODRC had failed to make the requisite showing, thus was not entitled to discretionary immunity as to Foster's negligence claims. See: Foster v. Ohio Dept of Rehab. & Corr., 2013 Ohio App. LEXIS 812 (Ohio Ct. App. 2013).

Short-term Deprivation of Toilet Paper Does Not Violate Detainee's Rights

THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT COURT OF Appeals has held that denial of toilet paper to a pretrial detainee for a short period of time does not violate the Fourteenth Amendment. The ruling reversed a district court's order which had concluded the defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity.

James M. Stickley brought an action under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 claiming his constitutional rights were violated when he was incarcerated at Arkansas' Faulkner County Detention Center (FCDC). The district court granted the defendants qualified immunity on several claims, but not as to Stickley's claim that they had refused to give him adequate toilet paper in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment (as Stickley was a pretrial detainee, his claims were brought under the Fourteenth rather than the Eighth Amendment).

From January to June 2010, Stickley was held at the FCDC awaiting trial. Pursuant to FCDC policy, he was issued only one roll of toilet paper per week; however, each week he exhausted his allotment before the week's end. His requests for additional toilet paper were denied as were his grievances. After his weekly roll of toilet paper was depleted, Stickley had to shower each time following a bowel movement. He often had to wait up to thirty minutes before being allowed to take a shower.

The Eighth Circuit concluded that "the amount of toilet paper afforded him, the limited time in which he went without toilet paper, and his ability to attend to his hygiene needs at those times" negated a finding that Stickley's constitutional rights were violated by the denial of additional toilet paper. The Court of Appeals noted that the facts alleged in this case were less severe than in Harris v. Fleming, 839 F.2d 1232 (7th Cir. 1988), which involved a deprivation of toilet paper for five days.

Accordingly, the district court's denial of qualified immunity to the defendants was reversed. See: Stickley v. Byrd, 703 F.3d 421 (8th Cir. 2013). ■

Washington: No Public Funds for Deferred Prosecution Treatment Programs

THE EN BANC WASHINGTON STATE Supreme Court has held that the legislature did not intend to commit public funds to cover the full cost of treatment for indigent defendants participating in deferred prosecutions.

A Washington defendant charged with a misdemeanor offense may petition for deferred prosecution if the crime was a result of substance abuse or mental illness; successful completion of a treatment program allows for dismissal of the charges.

RCW 10.05.130 requires appropriation of public funds "to provide investigation, examination, report and treatment plan for any indigent person who is unable to pay the cost of any program of treatment."

In separate cases, two defendants charged with driving while intoxicated petitioned Washington district courts for deferred prosecution. Both petitions were granted and, since the defendants were indigent, the courts approved the use of public funds to pay for their treatment programs.

A superior court vacated the funding orders, concluding that the plain language of RCW 10.05.130 authorizes public funds for "investigation, examination, report and treatment plan," but not the cost of the treatment program.

The state Supreme Court granted review to determine whether the statute's use of the phrase "treatment plan" encompasses the full course of treatment.

Agreeing with the superior court, the Court found that RCW 10.05.130 is plain and unambiguous. A "treatment plan" is simply a document describing the plan of action for treatment," the Supreme Court wrote. Therefore, "the legislature did not intend to commit public funds for the full course of treatment for indigent defendants in deferred prosecutions." Presumably, then, defendants will have to fund the cost of their treatment programs themselves – which will be difficult for those who lack the financial resources to do so. See: State v. Velasquez/Hutchison, 176 Wn.2d 333, 292 P.3d 92 (Wash. 2013). ■

State of Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign!

Prison Phone Justice Project needs your help for statewide campaign!

While much progress has been made in reducing the costs of long distance prison calls, we are still fighting to reduce the high costs of in-state prison and jail calls at the local level. In January 2014, the Human Rights Defense Center (HRDC), the parent organization of Prison Legal News, reopened its Seattle office to launch the Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign.

This is our first statewide phone justice campaign, and we're excited to have people involved on both the local and national levels who are dedicated to ending the exorbitant phone rates and kickbacks associated with the prison phone industry. David Ganim, HRDC's national Prison Phone Justice Director, has already been obtaining the phone contracts and rates for all 39 county jails in Washington, as well as data from the Washington Department of Corrections.

We recently hired a local campaign director, Carrie Wilkinson, who will manage our office in Seattle and coordinate the statewide campaign. Washington prisoners and their families pay some of the highest phone rates in the nation, and we need your help to win this battle!

Here's how you can help – first, please visit the Washington campaign website:

<http://nationinside.org/campaign/campaign-for-washington-prison-phone-justice>

There you can see all the ways you can make a difference. The site allows you to sign up for the campaign and upload videos and share blog entries about how high prison phone rates make it difficult for you to stay in touch with your incarcerated loved ones. You can also upload an audio message, and even call in your story to 1-877-410-4863, toll-free 24 hours a day, seven days a week! We need to hear how you and your family have been affected by high prison phone rates. If you don't have Internet access, you can mail us a letter describing your experiences and we'll post it. Send letters to HRDC's main office at: HRDC, Attn: WA Phone Justice Campaign, P.O. Box 1151, Lake Worth, FL 33460. Washington state prisoners can mail us letters and send a copy of this notice to their family members so they can get involved.

By choosing to participate in the Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign, you will be playing a key role in ending the unfair phone rates that prisoners' families have to pay. We cannot win this battle without your help, so please visit the campaign website and share your experiences! Donations are also welcome and greatly appreciated, and can be mailed to the above address or made online via the campaign site. Thank you for your support!

Jails Market Electronic Cigarettes to Prisoners

by Christopher Zoukis

JAIL ADMINISTRATORS HAVE FOUND A new revenue stream: exploiting prisoners' addiction to nicotine by selling them electronic cigarettes, or e-cigarettes, for a substantial profit.

Even as municipalities like Chicago, New York and Los Angeles enact restrictions on the sale of e-cigarettes, county jails across the country are peddling the nicotine vapor devices to prisoners. The profit margins on such sales can be as high as 400 percent.

At the Macon County Jail in Tennessee, Sheriff Mark Gammons buys Marlboro or menthol flavored e-cigarettes at $2.75 each, then resells them for $10. He said he had "taken pains" to not encourage smoking among prisoners, but budget problems led him to market e-cigarettes. He hopes to make $20,000 to $50,000 the first year, which will be used to increase the wages of jail staff; his guards earn a top salary of $10.58 an hour. "I just want my boys to make as much as they can," Gammons said.

E-cigarettes use a small battery to heat a solution which produces a water vapor that is inhaled. Nicotine is the most popular additive. Manufacturers have noticed the trend of selling e-cigarettes to prisoners and now produce plastic, non-reusable versions that are deemed "jail-safe." Jails in at least seven states sell the devices at prices ranging from $8 to $30. Since most jails ban smoking, electronic cigarettes have proven popular among prisoners who crave a nicotine fix.

In September 2013, 40 state Attorneys General sent a letter to the U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA), urging it to regulate e-cigarettes in the same manner as regular cigarettes. The FDA is expected to announce some type of regulation in the near future.

Millard "Gus" Gustafson, the Sheriff of Gage County, Nebraska, said he was happy to offer e-cigarettes to prisoners. "I look at this as something to control their moods. And so if they're not a good boy or girl, I'm going to take them away, just like I do with the TVs," Gustafson said he sold out of the first 200 e-cigarettes he bought for his jail.

Not everyone is supportive of the trend. "I think having an e-cigarette and having any influence of tobacco or nicotine in that jail is a horrible, terrible thing to do," remarked Gage County Supervisor Dennis Byars.

The American Lung Association said it was "deeply troubled" by the practice of using e-cigarettes as a moneymaker for jails. And Alex Friedmann, managing editor of Prison Legal News, noted that selling e-cigarettes was just another way to monetize the corrections system, and feeding prisoners' addiction to nicotine doesn't help them. "I think the fact remains [that] prisoners with other addictions, such as alcohol addiction, the jail is not providing [them] with beer and whiskey," he said.

"Prisoners with substance abuse addictions, such as Oxycodone, the jail is not providing them with that."

In October 2013, two Illinois counties – White and Saline – began selling e-cigarettes to prisoners in their jails. "I think it's a trend all counties will eventually adopt," stated White County jail administrator Randy Cobb.

Thus far, no state prison systems are offering e-cigarettes. ■

Justice Department Reports: Correctional Populations Declining at Slower Pace

by Derek Gilna

THE BUREAU OF JUSTICE STATISTICS has published two new reports, "Correctional Populations in the United States, 2012" and "Probation and Parole in the United States, 2012." Both indicate that although correctional populations continue to drop, the rate of decrease has slowed.

Approximately 6.9 million people were under correctional supervision in the U.S. in 2012, including prison, jail, probation and parole – a decrease of 51,000 from the previous year. This means that about 1 in 35 adults were under some form of correctional supervision, or 2.9% of the adult U.S. population.

A modest decline in the number of people held in state prisons marked the fourth year in a row that the prisoner population had dropped, with the largest single decrease occurring due to a reduction in California's prison system pursuant to court-ordered reforms. As a result of the California Public Safety Realignment Act of 2011, that state had 28,700 fewer prisoners in 2012 than it did the year before – which accounted for more than half the drop in the national correctional population.

emphasis on mass incarceration – finding that 2.2 million people were held in prisons and jails, 3.94 million were on probation and around 851,200 were on parole.

Those figures should be of interest to lawmakers as they try to understand why their correctional budgets remain so high.

Further, approximately 128,300 people were incarcerated in privately-operated state and federal facilities nationwide, the federal prison population increased in 2012 to almost 217,000 prisoners, and the total jail population increased slightly.

On a positive note, the probation and parole report found that 58% of parolees successfully completed their terms of parole or were discharged early in 2012, while 68% of probationers completed their terms of supervision or were discharged early.

In summary, both reports show that while the number of people incarcerated and under parole or probation supervision has dropped over the past several years, the rate of decline has slowed and the total correctional population remains exceedingly high – indicating there is still much work to be done to reduce the human costs and negative impact of our nation's criminal justice system. ■

Crime Declines while Anti-crime Funding Increases

by Christopher Zoukis

CRIME IS DOWN IN THE UNITED STATES, but spending measures included in the $1.1 trillion federal budget passed by Congress in January 2014 will ensure that many law enforcement agencies receive more funding.

Insiders give much of the credit for the fiscal year (FY) 2014 funding increases to Senate Appropriations Committee Chairwoman Barbara Mikulski, who is known as a strong proponent of crime-fighting expenditures. Senator Mikulski said the expanded funding represents a “truly bipartisan agreement that a significant number of members [of Congress] worked night and day [on] over the holidays.”

The big winners in federal law enforcement spending include the FBI, which received $8.3 billion, an increase of $248.7 million over FY 2013, and the federal Bureau of Prisons, which received $6.77 billion – an increase of $90.2 million.

The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives is also getting a boost in funding with a budget of $1.18 billion – more than $49 million over last year.

Little was said about how these funding increases square with the most recent federal statistics on crime, which reflect a decade-long downward trend. Indeed, even as legalization of medical marijuana becomes more commonplace across the nation (as well as legalization of marijuana for recreational use in Washington state and Colorado), the Drug Enforcement Agency’s $2.02 billion budget includes an increase of $9.6 million.

Critics of additional spending on law enforcement note there are few controls in place to monitor the use of federal funds that end up in state and local coffers through programs such as Byrne-JAG grants for police agencies – which received $367 million in funding in the FY 2014 federal budget – and the COPS community policing program, funded at $214 million.

Byrne-JAG grants frequently fund multi-jurisdictional task forces that have little accountability and have been linked to abuses like the mass arrests of black defendants in Tulia, Texas on fabricated drug charges. As funding is often tied to “performance” metrics, programs like HIDTA (High Intensity Drug Trafficking Area) grants encourage police to devote an inordinate amount of resources to those initiatives so as to inflate their arrest numbers.

The COPS program has no real controls or accountability either, and instead of such grants being used to put officers on the street, some jurisdictions have used them in whatever manner they want. Criminologist Peter Kraska has reported that “community policing” funds have been used for paramilitary SWAT teams, roadblocks and stop-and-frisk policies.

Notably, federal law enforcement expenditures have increased not only as crime rates and prison populations have dropped, but also as court budgets have declined and public defenders’ offices have laid off employees due to lack of funding. ■

News in Brief

Alaska: Prisoners in the segregation unit at Spring Creek Correctional Center were not happy with an inspection order that required them to make their beds and clean their cells. On August 5, 2013, around 14 prisoners showed their displeasure by yelling, breaking porcelain sinks and toilets, and flooding cells. Only one guard was on duty in the 32-man unit at the time. The Alaska Correctional Officers Association blamed the disturbance on chronic understaffing at the facility.

Arkansas: Glenda Estell, the mother of a prisoner who escaped from the Garland County Detention Center, was accused of assisting in the jailbreak and arrested on August 2, 2013. Police listened to 40 recorded phone calls to connect Estell to her son's July 28 escape. She was one of a network of several friends and family members who orchestrated the escape of jail prisoner Derrick Estell; a girlfriend, Tamara Upshaw, and her stepfather, William Harding, helped with a getaway car and a diversion to distract deputies. Derrick Estell and Upshaw were captured in Florida on August 23, 2013.

Australia: A guard who worked at the Dame Phyllis Frost Center, a maximum-security women's prison in Melbourne, told a prisoner's husband that he would "stash" something for his wife. As a result of that transaction, on August 30, 2013, Victorian County Court Judge Bill Stuart sentenced guard Ayhan Soylemez, 42, to two years and three months in prison for misconduct in public office. Judge Stuart said Soylemez had committed a gross breach of his duties, and noted that as a former prison guard his incarceration would be harsher. Two drug possession charges against Soylemez were dismissed.

Bolivia: A child was among 29 people killed in a violent clash among prisoners at the maximum-security Palmasola Penitentiary Complex outside Santa Cruz. On August 23, 2013, an explosion and the sound of gunfire were heard inside the facility as rival cell blocks fought for control of part of the prison; 35 people reportedly suffered injuries and were evacuated to local hospitals. Children routinely live with incarcerated family members in Bolivian prisons.

California: David John Calmere died at the scene of a July 18, 2013 accident after he led police on a high-speed chase through San Benito County. The 41-year-old prison guard employed at the Correctional Training Facility in Soledad lost control of his Toyota Tundra, hit both the right and left guard rails, then rolled the vehicle and was ejected. Calmere had fled from police when he was pulled over for speeding.

Connecticut: On July 25, 2013, the Associated Press reported that a routine state audit of benefits uncovered troubling information about Kevin Hornak, 50, a guard at the Bridgeport Correctional Center. Two women presented investigators with valid marriage certificates, and Hornak was charged with bigamy. Police reported that both wives knew each other but each believed she was the only one who was legally married. Hornak wed his first wife in 1984 in Philadelphia, and had assured his second wife that he was divorced when he married her in 2005 in Vermont.

Florida: A bet on a basketball game between two groups of juvenile offenders at the Avon Park Youth Academy devolved into a full-blown riot on August 18, 2013. The two groups of boys, from Orlando and St. Petersburg, had made a bet on the game for three packages of Cup O'Noodles. "The Orlando team won and the St. Pete team didn't pay up, so the original 10 started fighting," Sheriff Grady Judd said. Other teens joined in the brawl, which resulted in hundreds of thousands of dollars in damage to the facility. Approximately 150 law enforcement officers were needed to quell the disturbance.

Florida: On July 29, 2013, Richard Stotts, 48, was fired from his job as a Pinellas County detention deputy. Stotts was working in the booking area of the jail on May 8 when he abruptly smacked prisoner David Alan Koons on the head and neck, eventually pinning him to the ground. The incident was recorded on surveillance video. Stotts had been the subject of previous

CORRECTION NOTICE!

In the January 2014 issue of PLN, the article "FCC Rate Caps on Prison Phone Calls to Impact Nevada DOC's Budget" on page 47 incorrectly stated that the FCC's order capping interstate prison phone rates will go into effect on February 13, 2014. The correct date when the order will go into effect is February 11, 2014. For additional information, see the update on the Campaign for Prison Phone Justice in this issue of PLN.

investigations into improper conduct involving prisoners; he was not charged with assaulting Koons, because Koons declined to cooperate with investigators. This was the third time in a less than a year that a Pinellas County jail guard was fired for using excessive force.

Georgia: A former prison guard who pleaded guilty to smuggling phones and cigarettes into the Augusta State Medical Prison received probation and a harsh lecture from Richmond County Superior Court Judge Daniel Craig. Melissa L. Brown, 34, was charged with trading with inmates after a dog alerted to her vehicle during a search of prison employees. Judge Craig called Brown's misconduct a "treasonous deed" before sentencing her on August 29, 2013 to five years' probation under the First Offender Act. She also must perform 300 hours of community service and pay a $3,000 fine.

Illinois: An August 8, 2013 road rage incident resulted in murder charges being filed against a Cook County jail guard. Police say 23-year-old Montrel Moss threw a cup of water that hit a van being driven by jail guard Edgar Singleton, Jr. Singleton retaliated by shooting Moss in the neck with a 9mm handgun; Moss was pronounced dead a short time later. According to a statement from the Cook County Sheriff's Office, Singleton was subsequently de-deputized and fired.

Indiana: A report filed by Marion County jailers stated that on August 1, 2013, an unidentified 24-year-old Indiana Department of Child Services (DCS) worker flashed her official ID to gain access to the Marion County Arrestee Processing Center in order to get some "alone time" with a prisoner. The female DCS employee was escorted to a meeting room where jail staff said they saw her and the prisoner engage in unauthorized physical contact, including touching and holding hands. Upon questioning, the DCS worker admitted she had no official business at the jail; her badge was confiscated and she was ordered to leave. No criminal charges were filed, but she was fired in connection with the incident.

Indonesia: About 300 soldiers and 500 policemen were deployed around the Tanjung Gusta prison in Medan, the capital of North Sumatra, after a riot broke out on July 12, 2013. The facility, with a normal capacity of 1,054, was holding nearly 2,600 prisoners at the time. Five people were killed and hundreds of prisoners, including convicted terrorists, escaped during the riot. The disturbance was apparently triggered by a power outage that disabled the facility's water pumps and left prisoners without water. Akbar Hadi, a spokesman for prison officials, estimated that about 500 prisoners had resisted orders to stop rioting before security forces retook the facility.

Iowa: Rodney Eugene Long, 38, escaped from the Clarinda Correctional Facility on August 19, 2013 and shot a Taylor County deputy after stealing a gun in a residential burglary. The wounded deputy's survival was credited to his protective vest.

After leading police on a 40-minute chase, Long broke into the home of a retired prison guard and his wife, Jerome and Carolyn Mauderly, ages 71 and 66. Long held the Mauderlys hostage for several hours before Jerome Mauderly killed him using a shotgun.

Kansas: An unidentified guard at the El Dorado Correctional Facility fell from a watch tower at the prison on July 12, 2013. According to Kansas DOC Communications Director Jeremy Barclay, the state's Workers Compensation Law prohibits the release of the guard's name. The guard was alert and talking when taken to a Wichita hospital, and was treated and released less than four hours after the accident. According to Barclay, the tower was secured with proper railings.

Kansas: Former Sedgwick County jail guard David Kendall, 23, was charged with crimes ranging from aggravated sodomy to misdemeanor sexual battery for raping two prisoners and sexually propositioning four others. The prisoners have collectively filed claims totaling over $20 million against the county. Kendall posted $500,000 bond and was released from jail with a GPS monitoring system. At an August 30, 2013 hearing, testimony was presented that one of the prisoners accusing Kendall of rape had had consensual sex with him, then fabricated the rape claim to cash in on a civil suit.

Kazakhstan: On August 29, 2013, a military court sentenced a group of prison guards, including a high ranking official, who had been convicted of torturing a prisoner to death at a labor camp in the city of Zhezkazgan. The court found that the guards had beaten a prisoner for hours, then crucified the dying man on a metal fence in October 2012. Ten guards received five-year prison terms, some of which were suspended, while three received sentences of six years each. Human rights activists have long protested prisoners' rights abuses in Kazakhstan.

Maine: Shane Thomas, an Androscoggin County jail guard, filed suit against the county and Sheriff Guy Desjardins on August 15, 2013 after being cleared in a use-of-force incident. According to the lawsuit, Thomas was suspended for three days and as a result of the suspension suffered damage to his professional reputation and continues to suffer professional and personal injuries. A prisoner had filed a complaint after being involved in a physical confrontation with Thomas, but the district attorney decided that Thomas' use of force was justified. Sheriff Desjardins said he stood by the suspension because Thomas struck the prisoner in the head in violation of jail rules.

Michigan: Former Michigan DOC employee Michael Paul Salyers pleaded no contest on August 2, 2013 to a lesser charge of fourth-degree criminal sexual conduct; he was originally charged with two counts of second-degree criminal sexual conduct of a state prisoner. Police said that since 2006, Salyers had a sexual relationship with a female prisoner who has since been released. At the time, Salyers was a mechanic at the now-closed Camp Brighton facility.

Michigan: On August 6, 2013, a jury returned a not guilty verdict in the trial of Lansing jail guard David Gladstone, who was charged with misdemeanor assault and battery of a prisoner. Although Gladstone was found not guilty, an internal investigation is pending to determine whether he violated any departmental policies or procedures. He had been suspended pending the outcome of the criminal charge. [See: PLN, Dec. 2013, p.56].

Minnesota: A nurse working for a private medical contractor, Advanced Correctional Healthcare/Diamond Pharmacy Services, was charged with illegally obtaining prescriptions for oxycodone for personal use by using the names of prisoners in her care at the Isanti County Jail. Cara Sue Lindgren was charged with felony fifth-degree drug possession and felony fifth-degree drug possession by fraud or deceit on August 9, 2013. An investigation into wrongdoing at the jail remains ongoing.

New York: "I want you to knock his fucking teeth in." According to a June 26, 2013 report by the New York Daily News, that was what supervising warden Eliseo Parez allegedly told a team of Rikers Island guards. The team, which had been tasked with reducing violence at the jail, viciously attacked prisoner Jamal Lightfoot after he looked at one of them "funny." Prosecutors said the brutal beatdown – which knocked out some of Lightfoot's teeth and broke his eye sockets and nose – led the guards to try to cover up the assault. Sanford Rubenstein, Lightfoot's family lawyer, said prisoners at Rikers Island are not safe and that the incident was part of a "systemic problem" at the facility. The guards involved in Lightfoot's beating have pleaded not guilty.

New York: A violent, bloody brawl broke out among rival gangs – the Trinitarians and the Crips – at Rikers Island on August 22, 2013. As many as 50 prisoners were involved in the melee, which was reportedly triggered over the use of a hot plate to cook a grilled cheese sandwich. The fight lasted nearly an hour and eleven prisoners and a guard were injured. In surveillance video, prisoners were seen attacking each other with mop handles and hurling chairs; one prisoner also threw hot water, and several suffered serious stab wounds.

New Zealand: For 13 years, Roger Brooking had entered New Zealand prisons to conduct drug and alcohol assessments. In July 2013, however, he was banned from visiting Rimutaka Prison after he criticized the DOC for a multi-million dollar cell phone call blocking system that he deemed a "failed strategy." The DOC alleged that he had "breach[ed] prison security" by using

Ohio: August 14, 2013 marked the grand opening of a new rainbow trout farm at the Southeastern Correctional Complex in Lancaster. The fish are destined for the Columbus Zoo, where about 300 pounds a month will be used to feed the zoo's penguins. Another 100 pounds will be fed to polar bears, brown bears and otters. The trout will replace fish the zoo currently purchases from another state, and the project is funded by the prison's recycling program.

Oregon: Joseph Akins, Jr., 45, serving time for kidnapping, rape and murder, was killed in his cell at the Oregon State Penitentiary on August 17, 2013. Prison officials said Akins was found dead in C-block and the facility was immediately placed on lockdown. A medical examiner ruled that Akins died due to "inflicted trauma," and state police said the suspect in his death is his cellmate, Craig Dennis Bjork, 53, who had been convicted of 5 previous murders, including killing another prisoner in 1997.

Rhode Island: On July 18, 2013, Gaulter Botas, a former guard at the Rhode Island Adult Correctional Institute, received an 18-month prison sentence. Botas had assaulted prisoners by hitting one with a telephone book and another with a plastic clipboard, a package of paper, a bag of food and his closed fist. Four prisoners said they were assaulted by Botas and another guard, Kenneth Viveiros. Botas' conviction was upheld in April 2013 by the Rhode Island Supreme Court, and a superior court judge rejected his motion for a reduced sentence. In 2006, Botas and Viveiros were among a number of guards named in a lawsuit alleging that they had made a prisoner eat his own feces; that suit settled for $120,000. [See: PLN, Aug. 2007, p.28].

Romania: On July 30, 2013, a committee requested that the general prosecutor file charges against 87-year-old former prison commander Alexandru Visinescu for the deaths of six prisoners. Romania had communist governments from 1945 until 1989, and from 1956 to 1963 Visinescu ran the Ramnicu Sarat prison, notorious for its incarceration of Romania's pre-communist political leaders and intellectuals. The committee alleged the six prisoners had died from beatings, hunger, lack of medical treatment and exposure to cold. Visinescu rejected the accusations and entered a plea of innocence at a closed hearing in January 2014.

Switzerland: The consumption of cannabis is strictly prohibited in Switzerland, but is treated as less of a criminal priority than in the U.S. According to a study published on June 17, 2013 by the International Journal of Drug Policy, as many as 80% of Swiss prisoners use cannabis with the full awareness of prison staff. Prisoners and staff reported that it has a positive effect and named several benefits of cannabis consumption. Prison officials believe that cracking down on marijuana use would lead to an increase in violence, and said it is a relatively safe and peaceful drug.

Tennessee: According to officials at the West Tennessee State Penitentiary, transport guard Lonnie B. Rogers was arrested for bringing 40 cell phones and chargers, 22 ounces of marijuana and tobacco into the facility. Rogers reportedly received $700 from a woman to smuggle marijuana to prisoner Ronnie Henry. In an August 1, 2013 statement, TDOC Commissioner Derrick Schofield said, "This case demonstrates our commitment to zero tolerance of illegal contraband that threatens the security of our prisons."

Texas: One victim of former 404th State District Judge Abel Corral Limas presented impact testimony saying there was “outrage and shock at the magnitude of the corruption” committed by the disgraced judge, who entered a guilty plea to racketeering charges. In exchange for his plea, Limas was sentenced on August 21, 2013 to 72 months in federal prison, restitution of $6,777,270.50, three years of supervised release following his prison term and forfeiture of an additional $257,300 from proceeds from his criminal enterprise. Limas admitted that he routinely used his position as judge to enrich himself and others through extortion, and that his conduct was “not a mistake, it was intentional.”

Texas: Two former state prison guards at the Giles W. Dalby Unit face bribery charges, according to court documents filed in federal court in Lubbock. In separate incidents, Philip Andrew Tyler was accused of providing cocaine to a prisoner in exchange for money, while Cesar Ceja was charged with giving tobacco to a prisoner in exchange for a candy bar. Tyler and Ceja were charged on July 2, 2013.

Texas: In August 2013, a Texas billionaire under house arrest in his south Florida mansion awaiting retrial on a drunk driving manslaughter charge was allowed to fly by private jet to visit his dying mother at a Texas hospital. John Goodman’s original conviction was overturned because a juror had not revealed that his wife had once been arrested on a DUI charge. Goodman was initially approved to make the trip to Texas on a commercial flight escorted by four deputies, but was later allowed to travel via chartered plane. County officials said Goodman was responsible for all travel costs, meals and lodging related to the trip. ■

Corizon Needs a Checkup: Problems with Privatized Correctional Healthcare

by Greg Dober

CORIZON, THE NATION'S LARGEST FOR-profit medical services provider for prisons, jails and other detention facilities, was formed in June 2011 through the merger of Prison Health Services (PHS) and Correctional Medical Services (CMS).

In April 2013, the debt-rating agency Moody's downgraded Corizon's nearly $360 million worth of debt to a rating of B2 – an indication the company's debt is highly speculative and a high credit risk. According to Moody's, the rating downgrade was due to an "expectation of earnings volatility following recent contract losses, margin declines from competitive pricing pressure on new and renewed contracts, and Moody's belief that Valitas [Corizon's parent corporation] will be unable to restore metrics to levels commensurate with the prior B1 rating over the near to intermediate term."

Valitas Health Services is majority owned by Beecken Petty O'Keefe & Company, a Chicago-based private equity management firm. Beecken's other holdings are primarily in the healthcare industry.

On September 23, 2013, Moody's again downgraded Corizon's debt rating and changed the company's rating outlook from "stable" to "negative." The following month Corizon announced that it had replaced CEO Rich Hallworth with Woodrow A. Myers, Jr., the former chief medical officer at WellPoint Health. Hallworth, who had been appointed Corizon's CEO in 2011, previously served as the president and CEO of PHS. At the same time that Hallworth was replaced, Corizon president Stuart Campbell also stepped down.

Prison Medical Care for Profit

ACCORDING TO CORIZON'S WEBSITE, THE company provides healthcare services at over 530 correctional facilities serving approximately 378,000 prisoners in 28 states. In addition, Corizon employs around 14,000 staff members and contractors. The company's corporate headquarters is located in Brentwood, Tennessee and its operational headquarters is in St. Louis, Missouri.

The 2011 merger that created Corizon involved Valitas Health Services, the parent company of CMS, and America Service Group, the parent company of PHS. The Nashville Business Journal reported the deal was valued at $250 million.

"Corizon's vision is firmly centered around service – to our clients, our patients and our employees," Campbell said at the time. "To that we add the insight of unparalleled experience assisting our client partners, and caring professionals serving the unique healthcare needs of [incarcerated] patients."

Corizon has around $1.5 billion in annual revenue and contracts to provide medical services for the prison systems in 13 states. The company also contracts with numerous cities and counties to provide healthcare to prisoners held in local jails; some of Corizon's larger municipal clients include Atlanta, Philadelphia and New York City (including the Rikers Island jail). Additionally, the company has its own in-house pharmacy division, PharmaCorr, Inc.

The prison healthcare market has flourished as state Departments of Corrections and local governments seek ways to save money and reduce exposure to litigation. [See: PLN, May 2012, p.22]. Only a few major companies dominate the industry. Corizon's competitors include Wexford Health Sources, Armor Correctional Health Services, NaphCare, Correct Care Solutions and Centurion Managed Care – the latter being a joint venture of MHM Services and Centene Corporation. Around 20 states outsource all or some of the medical services in their prison systems.

As Corizon is privately held, there is little transparency with respect to its internal operations and financial information, including costs of litigation when prisoners (or their surviving family members) sue the company, often alleging inadequate medical care.

For example, when Corizon was questioned by the news media in Florida during a contract renewal, the company initially tried to prevent the release of its litigation history, claiming it was a “trade secret.”

In 2012, Corizon agreed to settle a lawsuit filed against PHS – one of its predecessor companies – by Prison Legal News, seeking records related to the resolution of legal claims against the firm in Vermont. Based on the records produced pursuant to that settlement, PHS paid out almost $1.8 million in just six cases involving Vermont prisoners from 2007 to 2011. [See: PLN, Dec. 2012, p.16].

Companies like Corizon provide healthcare in prisons and jails under the HMO model, with an emphasis on cutting costs – except that prisoners have no other options to obtain medical treatment except through the contractor.

Arizona DOC

A FORMER CORIZON NURSE HAD HER license suspended and is currently under investigation by the Arizona State Board of Nursing for incompetence. In January 2014, nurse Patricia Talboy was accused of contaminating vials of insulin at three units at the ASPC-Lewis prison, potentially exposing two dozen prisoners to HIV or hepatitis.

Talboy reportedly used a needle to stick prisoners’ fingers to check their blood sugar levels. She then used the same needle to draw insulin from vials of the medication utilized for multiple prisoners, possibly contaminating the insulin in the vials. After placing the vials back into inventory, other staff members may have unknowingly used them to dispense insulin.

“Every indication is that the incident is the result of the failure by one individual nurse to follow specific, standard and well-established nursing protocols when dispensing injected insulin to 24 inmates,” Arizona Department of Corrections (ADC) director Charles L. Ryan said in a January 9, 2014 statement.

Talboy’s failure to follow procedures was discovered after a prisoner told a different nurse about the issue. Corizon reportedly delayed three days before publicly reporting the incident; in a press release, the company admitted that one of its nurses had been involved in “improper procedures for injections.” Talboy received her nursing license in August 2012 and became an RN in June 2013; as a rookie nurse, Corizon likely paid her less than more experienced nurses.

Following the insulin-related incident, the company was ordered to develop a comprehensive plan that includes “supplemental training and competency testing procedures for blood glucose testing and administration of insulin,” as well as “nurse-peer reporting education to ensure professional accountability” and “patient awareness education on injection protocols.”

Granted, Corizon isn’t alone with respect to such incidents. In August 2012, a nurse employed by the ADC’s previous medical services contractor, Wexford Health Sources, contaminated the insulin supply at ASPC-Lewis through improper injection protocols, potentially exposing 112 prisoners to hepatitis C. [See: PLN, July 2013, p.1].

Corizon has a three-year, approximately $370 million contract to provide medical care in Arizona state prisons, which began in March 2013. The contract award generated controversy because former ADC director Terry Stewart was hired by Corizon as a consultant; current director Charles Ryan had previously worked under Stewart, raising a potential conflict of interest. Ryan denied any improprieties.

According to a report by the American Friends Service Committee released in October 2013, titled “Death Yards: Continuing Problems with Arizona’s Correctional Health Care,” medical services in Arizona prisons did not improve after Corizon replaced Wexford as the ADC’s healthcare contractor. “Correspondence from prisoners; analysis of medical records, autopsy reports, and investigations; and interviews with anonymous prison staff and outside experts indicate that, if anything, things have gotten worse,” the report stated.

Florida DOC

IN 2013, THE FLORIDA DEPARTMENT OF Corrections (FDOC) awarded Corizon a five-year, $1.2 billion contract to provide medical services to state prisoners in north and central Florida. Wexford Health Sources was contracted to provide similar services in the southern region of the state for $240 million. [See: PLN, June 2013, p.24]. The wholesale privatization of healthcare in Florida’s prison system followed a 2011 legislative decision to disband the state’s Correctional Medical Authority, which had oversight over prison medical care. [See: PLN, May 2012, p.30].

The contracts were part of the Republican administration's initiative to expand privatization of government services, including prison management and healthcare, in spite of previous setbacks. In 2006, PHS withdrew two months into an almost $800 million contract to provide medical care to Florida prisoners; at that time, the company said the contract was not cost-effective and claimed it would lose money.

The 2013 contract awards to Corizon and Wexford followed a two-year legal fight. In 2011, AFSCME Florida and the Federation of Physicians and Dentists/Alliance of Healthcare and Professional Employees filed suit challenging the prison healthcare contracts, in an effort to protect the jobs of nearly 2,600 state workers.

On June 21, 2013 the First District Court of Appeals approved the privatization of medical care in FDOC facilities, overturning a ruling by the Leon County Circuit Court. The appellate court noted in its decision that "The LBC [Legislative Budget Committee] simply moved funds from different line items within the Department's Health Services' program, providing additional funds for contracts that the Department otherwise had the authority to enter." See: Crews v. Florida Public Employers Council 79, 113 So.3d 1063 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1st Dist. 2013).

Under the terms of the FDOC's contract with Corizon, the company must provide medical care to Florida state prisoners for 7% less than it cost the FDOC in 2010. When entering into the contract, state officials apparently had few concerns about the numerous lawsuits previously filed against Corizon, and no hard feelings toward the company's predecessor, PHS, when it terminated its 2006 contract to provide medical services to Florida prisoners because it wasn't profitable.

"Most people feel, as long as they achieve their 7 percent savings who cares how they treat inmates?" noted Michael Hallett, a professor of criminology at the University of North Florida.

Florida Counties

IN A SEPTEMBER 6, 2012 UNPUBLISHED ruling, the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed a $1.2 million Florida jury verdict that found Corizon – when it was operating as PHS – had a policy or custom of refusing to send prisoners to hospitals. The Court of Appeals held it was reasonable for jurors to conclude that PHS had delayed medical treatment in order to save money. See: Fields v. Corizon Health, 490 Fed.Appx. 174 (11th Cir. 2012).

The jury verdict resulted from a suit filed against Corizon by former prisoner Brett A. Fields, Jr. In July 2007, Fields was being held in the Lee County, Florida jail on two misdemeanor convictions. After notifying PHS staff for several weeks that an infection was not improving, even with antibiotics that had been prescribed, Fields was diagnosed with MRSA. PHS did not send him to a hospital despite escalating symptoms, including uncontrolled twitching, partial paralysis and his intestines protruding from his rectum. A subsequent MRI scan revealed that Fields had a severe spinal compression; he was left partly paralyzed due to inadequate medical care.

The Eleventh Circuit wrote that PHS “enforced its restrictive policy against sending prisoners to the hospital,” and noted that a PHS nurse who treated Fields at the jail “testified that, at monthly nurses’ meetings, medical supervisors ‘yelled a lot about nurses sending inmates to hospitals.’” Further, PHS “instructed nurses to be sure that the inmate had an emergency because it cost money to send inmates to the hospital.”

At trial, the jury found that PHS had a custom or policy of deliberate indifference that violated Fields’ constitutional right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. The jurors concluded that Fields had a serious medical need, PHS was deliberately indifferent to that serious medical need, and the company’s actions proximately caused Fields’ injuries. The jury awarded him $700,000 in compensatory damages and $500,000 in punitive damages. [See: PLN, March 2013, p.54; Aug. 2011, p.24].

More recently, the estate of a 21-year-old prisoner who died at a jail in Manatee County, Florida filed a lawsuit in October 2013 against the Manatee County Sheriff’s Office and Corizon, the jail’s healthcare provider. The complaint accuses the defendants of deliberate indifference to the serious medical needs of Jovon Frazier and violating his rights under the Eighth Amendment.

In February 2009, Frazier was incarcerated at the Manatee County Jail; at the time of his medical intake screening, staff employed by Corizon, then operating as PHS, noted that his health was unremarkable. Frazier submitted a medical request form in July 2009, complaining of severe pain in his left shoulder and arm, and a PHS nurse gave him Tylenol.

Throughout August and September 2009, Frazier submitted five more medical requests seeking treatment for his arm and shoulder. “It really hurts! HELP!” he wrote in one of the requests. PHS employees saw him and recorded his vital signs. Despite the repeated complaints, Frazier was never referred to a doctor or physician assistant; on September 9, 2009 his treatment was documented as routine but he was placed on the “MD’s list.”

An X-ray was taken on September 17, 2009 to rule out a shoulder fracture.

The X-ray was negative for a fracture, and Frazier was not referred to a doctor. He submitted two more medical requests that month and five requests in October 2009 seeking treatment for his increasingly painful condition. The complaint alleges that in total, Frazier submitted 13 medical request forms related to pain over a period of three months; he was seen by a nurse each time but not examined by a physician.

On October 29, 2009, Frazier received an X-ray to determine if he had a tendon injury. An MRI was recommended and he was transported to a hospital where an MRI scan revealed a large soft tissue mass on his shoulder. A doctor at the hospital, concerned that the mass was cancerous, recommended additional tests.

After being diagnosed with osteosarcoma, a form of bone cancer, Frazier was returned to the jail and subsequently treated at the Moffitt Cancer Center, where he received chemotherapy, medication and surgery. Despite this aggressive treatment the cancer progressed and Frazier’s left arm was amputated. The cancer continued to spread, however, and he was diagnosed with lung cancer in June 2011. He died within three months of that diagnosis, on September 18, 2011.

In a letter to the attorney representing Frazier's estate, Florida oncologist Howard R. Abel wrote that the lack of treatment provided by Corizon at the Manatee County Jail constituted "gross negligence and a reckless disregard to Mr. Frazier's right to timely and professionally appropriate medical care."

The lawsuit filed by Frazier's estate claims that Corizon was aware of his serious medical condition but failed to provide adequate treatment. In addition, the complaint contends the company has a widespread custom, policy and practice of discouraging medical staff from referring prisoners to outside medical practitioners and from providing expensive medical tests and procedures. Finally, the lawsuit states that "Corizon implemented these widespread customs, policies and practices for financial reasons and in deliberate indifference to [the] serious medical needs of Frazier and other inmates incarcerated at Manatee County Jail."

On January 10, 2014, U.S. District Court Judge James Moody denied Corizon's motion to dismiss the case. The company had argued that the allegations in the lawsuit failed to assert sufficient facts to establish deliberate indifference, amounted only to medical negligence and were insufficient to establish gross negligence, and failed "to adequately allege a policy or custom that violated Frazier's rights." Judge Moody disagreed, finding the claims set forth in the complaint were "sufficient to establish a constitutional violation."

The Manatee County Sheriff's Office had better luck with its motion to dismiss. The Sheriff argued the complaint did not establish facts indicating that the jail had a similar practice – like Corizon – of providing deliberately indifferent medical care to prisoners. The court agreed and dismissed the claims against the Sheriff's Office; the claims against Corizon remain pending. See: Jenkins v. Manatee County Sheriff, U.S.D.C. (M.D. Fla.), Case No. 8:13-cv-02796-JSM-TGW.

Idaho DOC

IN FEBRUARY 2013, THE IDAHO DEPARTMENT OF CORRECTIONS (IDOC) announced it had reached a one-year extended agreement with Corizon to provide medical care in the state's prison system. However, the Idaho Business Review reported that the extension also resulted in a rate increase. Then-Corizon president Stuart Campbell informed the IDOC Board of Correction that the company wouldn't sign an extension for less money, stating the current contract had become too costly. During the preceding three years of the contract the IDOC had incurred approximately 20% in cumulative rate increases.

Both sides agreed that the contract would run through December 2013 and the IDOC would pay an additional $250,000.

It seems odd that Idaho was willing to continue contracting with the company, though, as the relationship between the IDOC and Corizon has been a rocky one.

The quality of medical care at the Idaho State Correctional Institution (ISCI) in Boise has been an ongoing issue for nearly three decades. The prison was the focus of a class-action lawsuit filed on behalf of prisoners alleging a variety of problems, including inadequate healthcare. The lawsuit was known as the Balla litigation after plaintiff Walter Balla.

In July 2011, after new complaints were filed regarding medical care at ISCI, U.S. District Court Judge B. Lynn Winmill appointed a special master, Dr. Marc F. Stern, to assess the situation at the facility. The court wanted Stern to confirm whether ISCI was in compliance with the temporary agreements established in the Balla case, and to investigate and report on "the constitutionality of healthcare" at the facility.

Dr. Stern, a former health services director for the Washington Department of Corrections who also had previously worked for CMS, one of Corizon's predecessor companies, issued a scathing report in February 2012. With the aid of psychiatrist Dr. Amanda Ruiz, Stern and his team reviewed ISCI over a six-day period and met with dozens of prisoners, administrators and Corizon employees.

Stern stated in the report's executive summary: "I found serious problems with the delivery of medical and mental health care. Many of these problems have either resulted or risk resulting in serious harm to prisoners at ISCI. In multiple ways, these conditions violate the rights of prisoners at ISCI to be protected from cruel and unusual punishment. Since many of these problems are frequent, pervasive, long-standing, and authorities are or should have been aware of them, it is my opinion that authorities are deliberately indifferent to the serious health care needs of their charges."

The report found that prisoners who were terminally ill or in long-term care were sometimes left in soiled linens, given inadequate pain medication and went for long periods without food or water. The findings regarding sick call noted instances in which prisoners' requests either resulted in no care, delayed care or treatment that was deemed dangerous. Emergency care situations had insufficient oversight, delays or no response; inadequately trained medical staff operated independently during emergencies without oversight from an RN or physician. The report also found problems with the pharmacy and medication distribution at ISCI.

In one case, a prisoner with a "history of heart disease was inexplicably dropped from the rolls of the heart disease Chronic Care Clinic." As a result, medical staff stopped conducting regular check-ups and assessments related to the prisoner's heart condition. A few years later the prisoner went in for a routine visit, complaining of occasional chest pain. No evaluation or treatment was ordered and the prisoner died four days later due to a heart attack. In another case, Corizon staff failed to notify a prisoner for seven months that an X-ray indicated he might have cancer.

Dr. Stern's report not only reviewed processes but also staff competency and adequacy. The report cited allegations that a dialysis nurse at ISCI overtly did not like prisoners, and routinely "failed to provide food and water to patients during dialysis, prematurely aborted dialysis sessions or simply did not provide them [dialysis] at all and failed to provide ordered medications resulting in patients becoming anemic." Stern concluded that prison officials were aware of this issue and the danger it presented to prisoners, but "unduly delayed taking action."

The mental health care provided by Corizon at ISCI was found to be deficient by Dr. Ruiz, who conducted the psychiatric portion of the court-ordered review. The report noted that the facility had 1) inadequate "screening of and evaluating prisoners to identify those in need of mental health care," 2) "significant deficiencies in the treatment program at ISCI" which was "violative of patients' constitutional right to health care," 3) an "insufficient number of psychiatric practitioners at ISCI," 4) incomplete or inaccurate treatment records, 5) problems with psychotropic medications, which were prescribed with no face-to-face visits or follow-up visits with prisoners and 6) inadequate suicide prevention training.

The report concluded: "The state of guiding documents, the inmate grievance system, death reviews and a mental health CQI [continuous quality improvement] system at ISCI is poor. While not in and of themselves unconstitutional, it is important for the court to be aware of this and its possible contribution to other unconstitutional events."

In March 2012, shortly after Dr. Stern's report was released over the objection of state officials, Corizon disagreed with its findings. The company retained the National Commission on Correctional Health Care (NCCHC) to review the report. Corizon described the review as an “independent assessment,” even though it was paying NCCHC accreditation fees.

The NCCHC review consisted of a three-person team assessing the facility over a two-day period in April 2012. Unlike Stern’s assessment of medical and mental health care, the NCCHC team did not interview prisoners or include a psychiatrist. Regardless, the agency concluded that “The basic structure of health services delivery at ISCI meets NCCHC’s standards.”

Corizon stated in a press release that Dr. Stern’s report was “incomplete, misleading and erroneous,” and then-CEO Rich Hallworth appeared in a video defending the company. The NCCHC had previously accredited Corizon’s healthcare services at ISCI, thus in essence the NCCHC’s review was self-validating the organization’s prior accreditation findings. Also, according to NCCHC’s website, two Corizon officials sit on the agency’s health professionals certification board of trustees.

Corizon’s criticism of Dr. Stern’s report is just one example where the company has objected to an independent, third-party assessment of its medical services. The Balla case settled in May 2012 after 30 years of litigation. [See: PLN, Feb. 2013, p.40].

Indiana DOC

FOLLOWING A COMPETITIVE BIDDING process, Corizon was selected to continue providing medical care to Indiana state prisoners under a three-year contract effective January 1, 2014. The contract has a cap of $293 million, based on a per diem fee of $9.41 per prisoner.

Three weeks later, a lawsuit filed in federal court named Corizon and the Indiana Department of Correction as defendants in connection with the wrongful death of prisoner Rachel Wood. Wood, 26, a first-time drug offender, died in April 2012; the suit, filed on behalf of her family, claims she was transferred from prison to prison and denied care for her serious medical conditions, which included lupus and a blood clotting disorder.

“Notwithstanding the duty of the prison medical staff to provide adequate medical care to Rachel and to treat her very serious life threatening conditions, prison medical staff willfully and callously disregarded her condition, and allowed Rachel to deteriorate and die,” the complaint stated.

“That is just the attitude of these guys, is saving money rather than providing health care,” said Michael K. Sutherland, the attorney representing Wood’s family.

Prison officials reportedly moved Wood among several different prisons and hospitals, and at one point lost track of her and claimed she had escaped even though she was still incarcerated.

“She died a horrible death and she died alone,” stated her father, Claude Wood. The lawsuit remains pending. See: Williams v. Indiana DOC, Marion County Superior Court (IN), Case No. 49D05-1401-CT-001478.

Maine DOC

IN AN OCTOBER 2013 BANGOR DAILY NEWS article, Steve Lewicki, coordinator of the Maine Prisoner Advocacy Coalition, discussed the state of healthcare in Maine’s prison system. “Complaints by prisoners are less,” he said, noting that while medical services provided to prisoners are better than in the past, there are still concerns. This relative improvement coincided with the end of the state’s contract with Corizon. The contract, valued at approximately $19.5 million, was awarded to another company in 2012.

A year earlier, the Maine legislature’s Office of Program Evaluation and Government Accountability (OPEGA) completed a review of medical services in state prisons. The agency contracted with an independent consultant, MGT of America, to conduct most of the fieldwork, and the review included services provided under Corizon’s predecessor company, CMS.

The OPEGA report, issued in November 2011, cited various deficiencies in medical care at Maine prisons – including medications not always being properly administered and recorded by CMS staff. Although the company was notified of the problem, no corrective action was taken. CMS employees did not follow policies related to medical intake and medical records; OPEGA reported that 38% of prisoners' medical files had inadequate or inaccurate documentation regarding annual physical assessments, and that files were not complete or consistently maintained. The report found 11% of sick calls reviewed were either not resolved timely or had no documented resolution. OPEGA also criticized CMS for inadequate staff training.

At a January 2012 legislative committee hearing, state Senator Roger Katz asked Corizon regional vice president Larry Amberger, "My question to you is in light of this history, why should the state seriously be considering any proposal your company might make to get this contract back again?"

In response, Amberger criticized the methodology used by MGT during the assessment and said he believed Corizon provided quality medical care. Questioning and challenging the findings of an independent reviewer is the same tactic the company used in Idaho. Regardless, Corizon's contract to provide medical care to Maine state prisoners is now a part of history.

Louisville, Kentucky

WHILE SOME JURISDICTIONS, LIKE MAINE, have chosen not to renew their contracts with Corizon due to performance-related problems, in 2013 the Metro Department of Corrections in Louisville, Kentucky (LMC) offered the company a chance to rebid for its $5.5 million contract to provide medical care at the LMC jail. This time, however, it was Corizon that said "no thanks."

The rebid offer was made even though seven healthcare-related prisoner deaths occurred in a seven-month period in 2012 during Corizon's prior contract, which expired in February 2013. Nevertheless, LMC and Corizon agreed to extend the contract through July 30, 2013 on a month-to-month basis pending a formal rebid.

After the expiration of the month-to-month contract extension, Corizon notified LMC that it was no longer interested in providing services to the corrections department and would not seek to rebid the contract. LMC director Mark Bolton told the Courier Journal he was "surprised" by the company's decision. What seems more surprising is that LMC wanted to continue contracting with Corizon to provide medical services in spite of the number of prisoner deaths.

In April 2012, Savannah Sparks, 27, a heroin addict and mother of three, was arrested and held on shoplifting charges at the LMC jail. While withdrawing from heroin she vomited, sweat profusely, could not sit up, could not eat or drink, and defecated and urinated on herself. Six days later she was dead. According to the medical examiner, her death was due to "complications of chronic substance abuse with withdrawal."

A subsequent wrongful death suit alleged that Corizon and LMC employees were negligent in failing to provide treatment for Sparks' opiate addiction and withdrawal. Corizon settled the suit under confidential terms. See: May v. Corizon, Jefferson County Circuit Court (KY), Case No. 13-CI-001848.

Four months after Sparks' death, on August 8, 2012, another LMC prisoner, Samantha George, died. A lawsuit filed in Jefferson County Circuit Court claimed that George was moved from the Bullitt County Jail to the LMC facility on a charge of buying a stolen computer. According to the complaint, she told a Corizon nurse that she was a severe diabetic, needed insulin, and was feverish and in pain from a MRSA infection.

The nurse notified an on-call Corizon physician, who was not located at the facility and thus could not examine George in person, to decide if she should be taken to an emergency room. The doctor recommended monitoring George and indicated he would see her the next day. George's condition rapidly deteriorated while she was monitored by staff at the jail; she was found unresponsive a few hours after being admitted to the facility and pronounced dead a short time later.

An autopsy concluded that George died due to complications from a severe form of diabetes compounded by heart disease. According to the lawsuit, the Corizon doctor never saw George; among other defendants, the suit named Corizon and LMC director Mark Bolton as defendants.

The case was removed to federal court, then remanded to the county circuit court in October 2013. See: George v. Corizon, U.S.D.C. (W.D. Ky.), Case No. 3:13-cv-00822-JHM-JDM.

A few weeks after George's death, Kenneth Cross was booked into the LMC jail on a warrant for drug possession. According to a subsequent lawsuit, upon Cross' arrival at the jail a nurse documented that he had slurred speech and fell asleep numerous times during the medical interview. Several hours later he was found unconscious, then died shortly thereafter due to a drug overdose. The lawsuit filed by Cross' estate alleged that employees at the LMC jail were deficient in recognizing and treating prisoners' substance abuse problems and that the facility was inadequately staffed for such medical care.

After the deaths of Sparks, George, Cross and four other prisoners in 2012, LMC director Bolton said he believed Corizon took too long to evaluate and treat prisoners at the jail. According to the Courier-Journal, Bolton sent an email to his staff in December 2012 regarding the prisoners' deaths, stating, "Mistakes were made by Corizon personnel and their corporation has acknowledged such missteps." He further indicated that Corizon employees – not LMC staff members – were responsible for the care of the prisoners who died. Six Corizon employees at the LMC jail resigned in December 2012 during an internal investigation; they were not identified.

Bolton's criticism was too little, too late to prevent the deaths of the seven LMC prisoners, though the jail has since made improvements to its medical services, including a full-time detox nurse and new protocols for prisoners experiencing withdrawal. One could speculate that LMC's critique of Corizon might be a litigation tactic, to deflect responsibility. The fact remains that seven deaths occurred under Corizon's watch and, notwithstanding those deaths, LMC was willing to renew its contract with the company.

In January 2014, the Louisville Metro Police's Public Integrity Unit concluded investigations into three of the deaths at the jail, and criticized both Corizon and LMC. The Commonwealth Attorney's Office found that Sparks' and George's deaths were preventable; however, no criminal charges were filed. Dr. William Smock, a forensic examiner who served as a consultant during the investigations, stated with respect to George's death: "There is compelling evidence of a significant deviation from the standard of care and medical negligence on the part of the medical providers."

"I'm glad to see that the government's investigation matches exactly what our investigation showed, which is that her death and others like hers is easily preventable," said Chad McCoy, the attorney representing George's estate.

Minnesota DOC

AFTER PROVIDING MEDICAL CARE TO Minnesota state prisoners for 15 years, Corizon was not selected when the contract was rebid in 2013 – despite having submitted the lowest bid. Instead, competitor Centurion Managed Care was to begin providing healthcare services in Minnesota's prison system effective January 1, 2014 under a two-year, $67.5 million contract.

Corrections Commissioner Tom Roy said the contract with Centurion was expected to "deliver significant savings to taxpayers while improving the quality of care for offenders."

According to the Star-Tribune, nine prisoners died and another 21 suffered serious or critical injuries in Minnesota correctional facilities due to delay or denial of medical care under the state's previous contract, which had been held by Corizon or its predecessor, CMS, since 1998.

That contract was for a fixed annual flat fee of $28 million. A flat fee contract provides an incentive for the contractor to tightly control costs, as a reduction in expenses results in an increase in profit. The Star-Tribune found that many of the staffing arrangements negotiated in the contract played a role in the deaths and injuries. For example, the contract allowed Corizon physicians to leave at 4:00pm daily and did not require them to work weekends. During off-hours there was only one doctor on call to serve the state's entire prison system, and many of the off-hour consultations were done telephonically without the benefit of the prisoner's medical chart. contract, Corizon was not required to staff most facilities overnight.

The Minnesota Department of Corrections was held liable for nearly $1.8 million in wrongful death and medical negligence cases during the period when the state contracted with Corizon or CMS.

In October 2012, a jury in Washington County awarded Minnesota prisoner Stanley Riley more than $1 million after finding a Corizon contract physician, Stephen J. Craane, was negligent in providing medical treatment. The Star-Tribune reported that Riley suffered from what turned out to be cancer and had written a series of pleading notes to prison officials. One read, "I assure you that I am not a malingeringer. I only want to be healthy again."

In May 2013, the state paid $400,000 to settle a lawsuit over the death of a 27-year-old prisoner at MCF-Rush City. Xavius Scullark-Johnson, a schizophrenic, suffered at least seven seizures in his cell on June 28, 2010. Nurses and guards didn't provide him with medical care for nearly eight hours. According to documents obtained by the Star-Tribune, Scullark-Johnson was found "soaked in urine on the floor of his cell" and was "coiled in a fetal position and in an altered state of consciousness that suggested he had suffered a seizure." An ambulance was called several hours later but a nurse at the prison turned it away, apparently due to protocols to cut costs. Corizon settled the lawsuit for an undisclosed sum in June 2013. See: Scullark v. Garin, U.S.D.C. (D. Minn.), Case No. 0:12-cv-01505-RHK-FLN.

Philadelphia, Pennsylvania

IN PHILADELPHIA, MAYOR MICHAEL A. Nutter has been accused of being too loyal to his campaign contributors, including Corizon. The company donated $1,000 to Nutter's 2012 campaign committee several months before the city renewed Corizon's contract to provide medical care to 9,000 prisoners in Philadelphia's prison system. Further, PHS donated $5,000 to Nutter's mayoral campaign in 2008.

The contract renewal would have been routine except for the fact that Corizon's performance in Philadelphia has been far from stellar. In July 2012 the company agreed to pay the city $1.85 million following an investigation that found Corizon was using a minority-owned subcontractor that did no work, which was a sham to meet the city's requirements for contracting with minority-owned businesses.

The renewed year-to-year Corizon contract, worth $42 million, began in March 2013. Nutter's administration was accused of using the year-to-year arrangement to avoid having the contract scrutinized by the city council; the city's Home Rule Charter requires all contracts of more than one year to be reviewed by the council. Further infuriating opponents of the contract, Corizon was not the lowest bidder. Correctional Medical Care (CMC), a competitor, submitted a bid that would have cost the city $3.5 million less per year than Corizon. Philadelphia Prison Commissioner Louis Giorla defended the city's decision to award the contract to Corizon at a council hearing; however, he declined to answer questions as to why the administration considered Corizon's level of care to be superior to that provided by CMC.

Three union contracts with Corizon covering 270 of the company's workers in Philadelphia's prison system expired on November 26, 2013. Corizon demanded benefit cuts, including changes in employee healthcare programs, to offset wage increases promised under the company's contract with the city. A strike was averted in December 2013 when the mayor's office intervened and both sides reached a settlement. The Philadelphia Daily News reported that the new union contracts provide wage increases but also include a less-generous health insurance plan for Corizon employees.

Since 1995, Corizon and its predecessor, PHS, have received $196 million in city contracts. The company's contract was terminated for several months in 2002 as a result of complaints that a diabetic prisoner had died after failing to receive insulin. The city renewed the contract anyway, citing affordability and pledging increased oversight. The city's law department estimates that Philadelphia has paid over $1 million to settle lawsuits involving claims of deficient prison healthcare; the largest settlement to date is $300,000, paid to a prisoner who did not receive eye surgery and is now partially blind.

Based upon the number of lawsuits filed against Corizon alleging inadequate medical care, its use of a sham subcontractor and the company's treatment of its own employees, it appears that maintaining the status quo – not best practices – may be the controlling factor in Philadelphia's continued relationship with Corizon.

Allegheny County, Pennsylvania

ON SEPTEMBER 30, 2013, A PRISONER jumped from the top tier of a pod at the Allegheny County Jail. Following an investigation, authorities refused to make public their findings and declined to disclose the prisoner's injuries, citing medical privacy laws. The prisoner, Milan Karan, 38, was not transported to the hospital until the following day.

A spokesperson for Corizon, which provides medical care at the 2,500-bed jail, defended the nearly 24-hour delay by noting the prisoner "was under observation" before being sent to a hospital.

In December 2013, the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette reported that Corizon was having difficulty staffing the Allegheny County Jail. When the newspaper requested a comment from Corizon vice president

Lee Harrington, Harrington claimed he had no knowledge of staffing problems – despite having previously received emails from the facility's warden about that exact issue.

The staffing problems resulted in prisoners not receiving their medication in a timely manner. In emails obtained by the Post-Gazette, Warden Orlando Harper wrote to Harrington in October 2013, noting, "We are continuing to experience issues pertaining to the following: 1. Staffing, 2. Medication distribution." Also, on November 17, 2013, Deputy Warden Monica Long sent an email to Corizon and jail staff. "I was just informed by the Captain on shift, the majority of the jail has not received medication AT ALL," she stated, adding, "Staffing is at a crisis."

That crisis had been ongoing since Corizon assumed the medical services contract at the facility on September 1, 2013. Before the $62.55 million, five-year contract was awarded, Corizon vice president Mary Silva wrote in an email that it was imperative the jail have "adequate staffing on ALL shifts." That promise was made despite Corizon laying off many of the former employees of Allegheny Correctional Health Services, the jail's previous healthcare provider.

Allegheny Correctional had provided four full-time and one part-time physician during its contract tenure. Corizon reduced the number of doctors to one full-time and one part-time physician. Allegheny Correctional also employed three psychiatrists and one psychologist. Corizon's contract requires that it provide one full-time psychiatrist and a part-time psychologist.

In January 2014, the United Steelworkers union (USW) filed a petition with the National Labor Relations Board to unionize Corizon employees at the Allegheny County Jail, including nurse practitioners, RNs, physician assistants and psychiatric nurses. USW representative Randa Ruge indicated that the Corizon workers had approached the union for representation due to intolerable working conditions.

"Our folks [Corizon employees] are in danger of losing their licenses to practice by some of the things that the company has them doing," she said. Ruge told the Post-Gazette that the jail had run out of insulin for more than a week and Corizon supervisors had "countermanded doctors' orders."

Several weeks after the USW filed the labor petition, a Catholic nun who worked as an RN at the jail was fired by Corizon, allegedly for union organizing activities. Sister Barbara Finch was dismissed after she openly expressed concerns about staffing, patient care and safety at the facility. The USW filed an unfair labor complaint against Corizon regarding Finch's dismissal, claiming she was terminated in retaliation for her union activities.

"This is a clear case of intimidation and union-busting at its worst," said USW President Leo W. Gerard. "Sister Barbara has been an outspoken advocate of change for these courageous workers and their patients, and this kind of illegal and unjust action, unfortunately, is par for the course with Corizon."

On February 14, 2014, Corizon employees at the Allegheny County Jail voted overwhelmingly to unionize. "The next step is getting to the bargaining table and getting Corizon to bargain in good faith and get some changes made in the health system at the jail," said Ruge.

The previous week, Allegheny County Controller Chelsa Wagner stated she had "grave and serious concerns" about medical care at the facility, including issues related to staffing and treatment for prisoners with certain mental health conditions. "I regard the current situation as intolerable and outrageous, and I fully expect necessary changes to be urgently implemented," she wrote in a letter to Corizon.

Polk County, Iowa

ON AUGUST 29, 2013, IEASHA LENISE Meyers, incarcerated at the jail in Polk County, Iowa on a probation violation, gave birth on a mattress on the floor of her cell. Her cellmates assisted with the delivery. Earlier, when Meyers, 25, had complained of contractions, a Corizon nurse called an offsite medical supervisor and was told to monitor the contractions and check for water breaking.

Despite Meyers having been twice sent to a hospital earlier the same day, and pleading that she was about to give birth, the nurse did rounds in other parts of the jail. Guards reportedly did not check on Meyers as required, even though the birth could be seen on a nearby security monitor. Only after the baby was born was medical care provided. Sheriff Bill McCarthy defended the actions of jail staff.

Corizon Employee Misconduct

LIKE MOST PRIVATE CONTRACTORS THAT provide prison-related services, Corizon tends to cut costs in terms of staffing and operational expenses. As noted above, this includes paying lower wages, providing fewer or inferior benefits and hiring less qualified workers who can be paid less. Sometimes, however, these practices result in employees more like to engage in misconduct.

At the Pendleton Correctional Facility in Indiana, a Corizon nurse was arrested and charged with sexual misconduct, a Class C felony. The Herald Bulletin reported that in April 2013, when Colette Ficklin was working as a contract nurse for Corizon, she convinced a prisoner to fake chest pains so they could be alone in an exam room. A guard told internal affairs officers that she witnessed Ficklin and the prisoner engaging in sex acts in the prison's infirmary. [See: PLN, Sept. 2013, p.17].

In March 2013 at the Indiana State Prison in Michigan City, a Corizon practical nurse was charged with drug trafficking and possession with intent to distribute. Phyllis Ungerank, 41, was arrested and booked into the LaPort County Jail after attempting to smuggle marijuana into the facility. [See: PLN, July 2012, p.50].

was fired after officials learned she was having sex with and giving money to a prisoner. Valerie Konieczny was terminated on December 18, 2012 when the jail was contacted by the brother of prisoner Randy Joe Schimp, who had written in a letter that a nurse was having sex with him and depositing money into his jail account. Investigators determined that Konieczny was the nurse who had sex with Schimp at both the Volusia County facility and another branch jail in 2011.

In New Mexico, Corizon physician Mark Walden was accused of fondling prisoners' genitals and performing prostrate exams that were "excessive and inappropriate in terms of length and method." At times, Walden reportedly did not wear gloves during the prostate exams. He was accused of sexually abusing 25 or more male prisoners while employed as a doctor at two privately-operated facilities, the Guadalupe County Correctional Facility in Santa Rosa and Northeast New Mexico Detention Facility in Clayton.

Lawsuits were filed against Walden, Corizon and private prison operator GEO Group, and Walden's medical license was suspended in December 2013. The suits claim that Corizon allowed Dr. Walden to work at the Clayton prison "despite knowing of the risk of sexual abuse and having the ability to know that [he] was repeatedly sexually abusing patients" at the Santa Rosa facility. [See: PLN, Sept. 2013, p.47].

The Privatization Model

ECONOMICS PROFESSORS KELLY BEDARD and H.E Frech III at the University of California at Santa Barbara examined the privatization of correctional medical services in their research study, "Prison Health Care: Is Contracting Out Healthy?," published in Health Economics in November 2009.

They concluded: "We find no evidence to support the positive rhetoric regarding the impact of prison health care contracting out on inmate health, at least as measured by mortality. Our findings of higher inmate mortality rates under contracting out are more consistent with recent editorials raising concerns about this method of delivering health care to inmates."

Today, five years after the Bedard-Frech report was published, it has the benefit of hindsight. Since the report was written, its findings and conclusions have been reaffirmed in prisons and jails across the nation that have contracted with private companies to provide medical care to prisoners. Cost reductions in the provision of correctional healthcare tend to result in greater inefficiencies that lead to poorer outcomes. Consequently, for-profit medical contractors may actually be increasing morbidity and mortality in prison and jail populations.

Many governmental entities are willing to outsource correctional healthcare to private companies; reasons for doing so include cutting costs, risk management and removing healthcare duties from corrections departments. If Corizon's record with respect to providing medical care to prisoners seems dismal, the company can always defend its actions by stating it does what it has been hired to do: Cut costs for its customers. And those costs have been rising due to an increasingly aging, and thus medically-needy, prison population. [See: PLN, Nov. 2012, p.22; Dec. 2010, p.1].

With respect to risk management, litigation is not a compelling issue within the prison healthcare industry and Corizon views lawsuits as simply a cost of doing business. "We get sued a lot, but 95% or 97% of cases were self-represented cases," ex-CEO Rich Hallworth was quoted in an August 2013 article. He added that most lawsuits settle for an average of less than $50. Of course it is difficult for prisoners to obtain representation to pursue litigation – unless it's a wrongful death case, and then usually their family or estate is doing the suing.

Nor are the public agencies that contract with private medical providers greatly concerned about their litigation records. In fact, when Florida contracted with Corizon and Wexford Health Sources to provide medical care for the state's entire prison system, the Florida Department of Corrections didn't ask the companies about their litigation histories – such as lawsuits raising claims of deliberate indifference, negligence and medical malpractice.

"What really troubles me about this is the fact that the department didn't ask these very basic, elemental questions any system would ask," observed ACLU National Prison Project staff attorney Eric Balaban. "These two vendors were taking

The correctional healthcare industry, comprised of only a few large companies, is highly competitive. When one company loses a contract, another is more than will-

According to Dr. Marc Stern, the court-appointed special master in Idaho, “whoever delivers prison healthcare is doing it on less than adequate funding because that’s how much municipalities, state legislatures and county commissions are allocating.” He noted that privatization can be good in some cases and bad in others, depending on the level of oversight by the contracting public agency.

Why? Because continuity maintains cost control, which is the driving force behind privatization of prison and jail medical services.

Conclusion

THE INTENT OF THIS ARTICLE WAS TO REVIEW Corizon's performance and practices based on publicly-available information, including news reports and court records. Although the company was formed in June 2011, its two predecessor firms, PHS and CMS, littered the news and judicial dockets over the years with lawsuits and articles involving cases of inadequate healthcare. Thus, the sins of Corizon's parents, CMS and PHS, are forever linked with the progeny of their merger.

Such past misdeeds could be explained away had Corizon adopted a new, post-merger culture that was removed from prior practices under PHS and CMS. However, many of Corizon's mid-level and top executives – including ex-CEO Rich Hallworth, former president Stuart Campbell, chairman Richard H. Miles and a number of vice presidents – were previously executives with PHS or CMS. It was during their tenure at those companies that numerous cases involving deficient medical care occurred.

The corporate culture of Corizon, as well as its business model, appears to be largely the same as those of its predecessors. Therefore, the only thing that may have changed as a result of the merger that created Corizon is the company's name. ■

Florida County Agrees to Pay $4 Million to Deceased Prisoner's Estate

by Derek Gilna

NICHOLAS T. CHRISTIE, INCARCERATED at the Lee County jail in Ft. Myers, Florida, died on March 31, 2009 after being repeatedly pepper sprayed by deputies while strapped to a restraint chair. Following three years of litigation, Lee County officials agreed in May 2013 to pay a record settlement of $4 million to Christie's estate.

The jail's for-profit medical contractor, Prison Health Services (PHS), now known as Corizon, was named as a defendant in the federal lawsuit and included in the settlement agreement.

The § 1983 suit raised claims related to Christie's death under the "Fourth, Eighth and/or Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution, the laws of the United States, and the laws of the State of Florida."

The complaint alleged that Christie was "restrained to a chair with a hood over his head and face for several hours in the custody of the Lee County Sheriff, while being detained on a misdemeanor trespass charge," and that medical staff at the jail failed to provide him with adequate care after he showed signs of respiratory distress during and after that incident. Medical personnel, the lawsuit stated, "acted willfully, wantonly, maliciously, and with reckless and callous disregard for and deliberate indifference to the serious medical and mental health needs of Nick Christie, and in a manner that shocks the conscience and offends traditional notions of decency, all of which led to his wrongful and untimely death."

According to the complaint, prior to and during his placement in the restraint chair, Christie disclosed to jail staff that he had "certain serious medical conditions..., including, but not limited to, Chronic Obstructive Pulmonary Disease (COPD), a heart condition, cardiovascular disease, atrial fibrillation, obesity, gout, back pain, constipation, and umbilical hernia, all of which was recorded and documented in Mr. Christie's PHS medical chart/record."

Further, Christie's wife had contacted jail officials to advise them of her husband's medical conditions and to inform them he had not been taking his medication regularly, which often caused him to act in an erratic manner. When Christie was booked into the jail, officials confiscated the medications he had with him and failed to refer him for a proper medical intake evaluation that would have resulted in the jail reissuing his prescribed medications to replace those that were taken.

A report by Florida's state medical examiner found the cause of Christie's death was "hypoxic encephalopathy, following resuscitation for cardiac arrest, due to or as a consequence of cardiogenic shock with congestive heart failure, due to or as a consequence of physiologic stress, following restraint and noxious effects of Oleoresin Capsicum" – i.e., the pepper spray used by sheriff's deputies.

The often excessive and abusive use of "restraint chairs" by corrections officials has been criticized by prisoners' rights groups and has resulted in litigation in other jurisdictions as well. Unfortunately for Christie, the failure of Lee County jail staff to follow proper procedures and the failure of PHS employees to provide adequate medical care led to his death. And unfortunately for the county and PHS, those failures resulted in a $4 million settlement to resolve the subsequent lawsuit filed by Christie's estate. See: Christie v. Scott, U.S.D.C. (M.D. Fla.), Case No. 2:10-cv-00420-UA-DNF. ■

Seventh Circuit Upholds Removal of Prisoner's Dreadlocks

THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS has held that an Illinois prisoner's religious rights were not violated when prison officials required him to cut off his dreadlocks to be transported to a court hearing.

Peter A. Lewis, incarcerated at the Dixon Correctional Center, is a member of a religious sect called the African Hebrew Israelites of Jerusalem. Consistent with the requirements of his faith, Lewis took the voluntary Nazirith vow, which, among other things, committed him to not cut his hair. He had previously filed suit against prison officials, claiming that they infringed his religious freedom by refusing to let him have visits unless he agreed to cut his hair. A 2003 settlement in that lawsuit allowed Lewis to have visitors if he permitted guards to search his dreadlocks for contraband before and after each visit.

Prison officials gave Lewis a choice in January 2004, when he was scheduled to appear in federal court. He could either get a haircut or go to segregation as punishment for eluding (by refusing a haircut) his scheduled court hearing. Lewis chose the haircut, then claimed prison officials knew his court date had been postponed, depriving them of a security concern that justified cutting his hair.

A dispute existed as to what prison officials knew about the court date, and when. It was undisputed, however, that Lewis was transported to court shortly after the originally-scheduled court hearing. The Seventh Circuit wrote, "it is obvious that transporting prisoners and placing them in courtrooms presents significant security concerns, warranting protective measures."

The appellate court held that prison officials' discretion relative to security-related matters extends to a determination that a particular prisoner's dreadlocks are too thick or dense to be readily searchable on a certain occasion, such as a visit to federal court. There was no evidence that Lewis was treated differently than other similarly situated prisoners, nor that the prison's security concerns were outweighed by his interest in engaging in a sincere religious observance.

The district court's order granting summary judgment to the defendant prison officials was therefore affirmed, and the U.S. Supreme Court denied Lewis' petition for writ of certiorari on October 7, 2013. See: Lewis v. Sternes, 712 F.3d 1083 (7th Cir. 2013), cert. denied.

The Seventh Circuit had previously held that an Illinois prison guard violated a prisoner's First Amendment rights by ordering his dreadlocks to be forcibly cut, and that the guard was not entitled to qualified immunity. However, the appellate court noted that the facts in that case involved "outright arbitrary discrimination rather than a failure merely to 'accommodate' religious rights." [See: PLN, April 2013, p.44]. ■

THIS MONTH'S COVER STORY ON CORIZON, the company formed by the merger of Prison Health Services and Correctional Medical Services, is our most recent reporting on an issue that has been ongoing for the past several decades. Namely, the prison HMO model whereby corrections agencies contract with for-profit companies to provide medical services to prisoners, while the companies' business model requires that they delay or deny treatment in order to make a profit. Not surprisingly this results in a pattern of deaths, injuries and pain suffered by prisoners who have no other options for obtaining medical care.

What is interesting is that despite decades of abuse, corruption and fraud, the government entities that contract with for-profit prison medical providers still fail to adequately monitor and audit their performance. Even after repeated contractual violations, if one company's contract is canceled or expires, the government typically awards the contract to another corporation with similar performance problems. Besides Corizon, other prison medical care companies include Wexford Health Sources, Centurion, NaphCare, Armor Correctional Health Services, Correct Care Solutions and Conmed Health Management.

The notion that such companies should actually be required to provide the medical services for which they are being paid with taxpayer dollars seems alien to the government officials who enter into these contracts. If anyone has information on services that are being contracted by corrections agencies but not being performed by medical care providers or other private prison companies, please contact us with details.

Second Circuit Vacates Magistrate's Judgment Entered without Consent

ON MARCH 6, 2013, THE SECOND Circuit Court of Appeals vacated the summary judgment dismissal of a New York prisoner's lawsuit, finding he had not consented to having the case decided by a magistrate judge.

Willie James Yeldon filed suit in federal court against numerous New York and Wyoming prison and community-based doctors under 42 U.S.C. § 1983.

Although he expressly declined to consent to the appointment of a magistrate

We are in the process of redesigning our websites for Prison Legal News, the Human Rights Defense Center and the Campaign for Prison Phone Justice, to make them easier to use and navigate and to incorporate all the technological updates that have occurred since our last website design. The new sites should be online within the next several months.

As we move into 2014, our goal is to increase our circulation by adding another 1,000 print subscribers. You can help by encouraging others to subscribe or giving someone a gift subscription. Please consider doing both, and enjoy this issue of PLN.

judge, the district court entered a February 8, 2008 order referring the case to a magistrate pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 636(c). The magistrate judge then granted summary judgment to the defendants on all of Yeldon's claims.

On appeal, the Second Circuit noted it had previously held in N.Y. Chinese TV Programs, Inc. v. U.E. Enterprises, 996 F.2d 21 (2d Cir. 1993) that consent to appoint a magistrate judge must be "truly voluntary," and "consent of all parties must be clear and express or the requirement would mean little."

Recognizing that Yeldon had expressly refused to consent to a magistrate, the Court of Appeals could not find on the record before it that he gave implied consent by failing to object to the district court's February 2008 order.

"As a pro se litigant, he may not have appreciated that participating in proceedings before the Magistrate Judge could impugn the effectiveness of his written refusal to consent," the appellate court wrote.

Since "the lack of consent is a jurisdictional defect that cannot be waived," the Court of Appeals found the magistrate lacked authority to enter final judgment under 28 U.S.C. § 636(c)(1), and that the Court consequently lacked jurisdiction to review that judgment. The Second Circuit therefore vacated the judgment, holding that Yeldon had not consented to the appointment of a magistrate judge. See: Yeldon v. Fisher, 710 F.3d 452 (2d Cir. 2013).

State of Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign!

Prison Phone Justice Project needs your help for statewide campaign!

While much progress has been made in reducing the costs of long distance prison calls, we are still fighting to reduce the high costs of in-state prison and jail calls at the local level. In January 2014, the Human Rights Defense Center (HRDC), the parent organization of Prison Legal News, reopened its Seattle office to launch the Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign.

This is our first statewide phone justice campaign, and we're excited to have people involved on both the local and national levels who are dedicated to ending the exorbitant phone rates and kickbacks associated with the prison phone industry. David Ganim, HRDC's national Prison Phone Justice Director, has already been obtaining the phone contracts and rates for all 39 county jails in Washington, as well as data from the Washington Department of Corrections.

We recently hired a local campaign director, Carrie Wilkinson, who will manage our office in Seattle and coordinate the statewide campaign. Washington prisoners and their families pay some of the highest phone rates in the nation, and we need your help to win this battle!

Here's how you can help – first, please visit the Washington campaign website:

There you can see all the ways you can make a difference. The site allows you to sign up for the campaign and upload videos and share blog entries about how high prison phone rates make it difficult for you to stay in touch with your incarcerated loved ones. You can also upload an audio message, and even call in your story to 1-877-410-4863, toll-free 24 hours a day, seven days a week! We need to hear how you and your family have been affected by high prison phone rates. If you don't have Internet access, you can mail us a letter describing your experiences and we'll post it. Send letters to HRDC's main office at: HRDC, Attn: WA Phone Justice Campaign, P.O. Box 1151, Lake Worth, FL 33460. Washington state prisoners can mail us letters and send a copy of this notice to their family members so they can get involved.

By choosing to participate in the Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign, you will be playing a key role in ending the unfair phone rates that prisoners' families have to pay. We cannot win this battle without your help, so please visit the campaign website and share your experiences! Donations are also welcome and greatly appreciated, and can be mailed to the above address or made online via the campaign site. Thank you for your support!

Why There's an Even Larger Racial Disparity in Private Prisons Than in Public Ones

by Katie Rose Quandt

IT'S WELL KNOWN THAT PEOPLE OF color are vastly overrepresented in U.S. prisons. African-Americans and Latinos constitute 30 percent of the U.S. population and 60 percent of its prisoners. But a new study by University of California-Berkeley researcher Christopher Petrella addresses a fact of equal concern. Once sentenced, people of color are more likely than their white counterparts to serve time in private prisons, which have higher levels of violence and recidivism and provide less sufficient health care and educational programming than equivalent public facilities. [See: PLN, March 2013, p.16].

The study compares the percentage of prisoners identifying as black or Hispanic in public prisons and private prisons in nine states. It finds that there are higher rates of people of color in private facilities than public facilities in all nine states studied, ranging from 3 percent in Arizona and Georgia to 13 percent in California and Oklahoma. According to Petrella, this disparity casts doubt on cost-efficiency claims made by the private prison industry and demonstrates how ostensibly "colorblind" policies can have a very real effect on people of color.

The study points out an important link between prisoner age and race. Not only do private prisons house high rates of people of color, they also house low rates of individuals over the age of 50 – a subset that is more likely to be white than the general prison population. According to the study, "the states in which the private versus public racial disparities are the most pronounced also happen to be the states in which the private versus public age disparities are most salient." (California, Mississippi and Tennessee did not report data on prisoner age).

Private prisons have consistently lower rates of older prisoners because they often contractually exempt themselves from housing medically expensive – which often means older – individuals, which helps them keep costs low and profits high. This is just another example of the growing private prison industry's prioritization of profit over rehabilitation, which activists say leads to inferior prison conditions and quotas requiring high levels of incarceration even as crime levels drop. The number of state and federal prisoners housed in private prisons grew by 37 percent from 2002 to 2009, reaching 8 percent of all prisoners in 2010.

The high rate of incarceration among young people of color is partly due to the war on drugs, which introduced strict sentencing policies and mandatory minimums that have disproportionately affected non-white communities for the past 40 years. As a result, Bureau of Justice Statistics data shows that in 2009, only 33.2 percent of prisoners under 50 reported as white, as opposed to 44.2 percent of prisoners aged 50 and older.

So when private prisons avoid housing older prisoners, they indirectly avoid housing white prisoners as well. This may explain how private facilities end up with "a prisoner profile that is far younger and far 'darker' ... than in select counterpart public facilities."

Private prisons claim to have more efficient practices, and thus lower operating costs, than public facilities. But the data suggest that private prisons don't save money through efficiency, but by cherry-picking healthy prisoners. According to a 2012 ACLU report, it costs $34,135 to house an "average" prisoner and $68,270 to house an individual 50 or older. In Oklahoma, for example, the percentage of individuals over 50 in minimum- and medium-security public prisons is 3.3 times that of equivalent private facilities.

"Given the data, it's difficult for private prisons to make the claim that they can incarcerate individuals more efficiently than their public counterparts," Petrella tells Mother Jones. "We need to be comparing apples to apples. If we're looking at different prisoner profiles, there is no basis to make the claim that private prisons are more efficient than publics."

He compared private prisons to charter schools that accept only well-performing students and boast of their success relative to public schools.

David Shapiro, former staff attorney at the ACLU National Prison Project, agrees. "The study is an example of the many ways in which for-profit prisons create an illusion of fiscal responsibility even though the actual evidence of cost savings, when apples are compared to apples, is doubtful

People of Color in Public vs. Private Prisons

In every state studied, the rate of black and Hispanic inmates is higher within private prisons at best," he says. "Privatization gimmicks are a distraction from the serious business of addressing our addiction to mass incarceration."

But in addition to casting doubt on the efficacy of private prison companies, Petrella says his results "shed light on the ways in which ostensibly colorblind policies and attitudes can actually have very racially explicit outcomes. Racial discrimination cannot exist legally, yet still manifests itself."

Alex Friedmann, managing editor of Prison Legal News, calls the study a "compelling case" for a link between age disparities and race disparities in public and private prison facilities. "The modern private prison industry has its origins in the convict lease system that developed during the Reconstruction Era following the Civil War, as a means of incarcerating freed slaves and leasing them to private companies," he says. "Sadly, Mr. Petrella's research indicates that the exploitation of minority prisoners continues, with convict chain gangs being replaced by privately-operated prisons and jails."

* The study draws on data from nine states – Arizona, California, Colorado, Georgia, Mississippi, Ohio, Oklahoma, Tennessee and Texas – selected because they house at least 3,000 individuals in private minimum- and medium-security facilities.

Arrest-Proof Yourself, by Dale Carson and Wes Denham (Chicago Review Press, 2007). 282 pages (paperback), $14.95.

Book review by John E. Dannenberg

IN SHORT, ARREST-PROOF YOURSELF IS A colorfully-written manual on how to avoid being arrested. The book's principal thesis is a hypothetical "electronic plantation" where all persons who are arrested – even if later exonerated – must serve an irrevocable life sentence of being blacklisted from future employment, socially ostracized, etc. as a result of their arrest record. The book is written in street language to garner the attention of younger people who, statistically, are more likely to face arrest. The authors emphatically counsel the reader, wherever possible, to simply avoid being seen by the police; but if stopped, they provide advice on how to act and, more importantly, how not to act.

Authors Carson and Denham speak from years of experience: Carson was a former police officer in both state and federal jurisdictions while Denham is a private investigator. Carson, now a defense attorney, today defends the very people who, in Arrest-Proof Yourself, he tries to prevent from needing his services. Throughout the book the authors speak about how police officers love to arrest people, which not only makes them happy but also improves their job performance reviews. Accordingly, police are not motivated to help little old ladies cross the street but rather to arrest as many people as they can. The means by which people are targeted for arrest, and whether they are arrested following a police stop, are the central topics of Arrest-Proof Yourself.

Those targeted for arrest are not the rich and famous, who have good attorneys and money to influence prosecution decisions, but rather the average person who is less educated and lacks street smarts. Those are the people who comprise the millions arrested each year for misdemeanors, traffic violations and petty crimes – mostly non-violent offenses. Arrest-Proof Yourself examines why they are even stopped by police officers, let alone arrested.

Most people are not arrested for something they do in plain view of the police but for incidental things during the course of a routine stop and search. This commonly occurs when people are pulled over in vehicle stops – such as for a defective brake light – and an incidental search reveals drugs, weapons or stolen property in plain sight. If the suspect doesn't have a good attitude, can't produce ID, registration or insurance, is in the "wrong neighborhood," has outstanding unpaid tickets or warrants, or has medication without a copy of the doctor's prescription, then he or she is likely to be arrested rather than receive a citation. And that arrest record, standing alone, will destroy the person's otherwise clean record for all time due to the ubiquitous online data that follows everyone wherever they go; those once upstanding citizens are consigned forever to the "electronic plantation."

Arrest-Proof Yourself is written in an arrogant style, demonstrating through the authors' experience the nature of police officers to arrest as many people as possible. The treatment of suspects is described as demeaning, revealing an unfair and biased arrest process that primarily targets the less fortunate and impoverished. Although published in 2007, this book provides information that remains timely today and is a sobering wake-up call. Arrest-Proof Yourself is available in PLN's bookstore on page 62 of this issue. 📖

When Victims Speak Up in Court – in Defense of the Criminals

by Andrew Cohen

A death penalty case in Colorado has generated an unusual fight between a district attorney and two parents who oppose capital punishment against the man who murdered their son.

ONE OF THE MOST PROFOUND CHANGES in criminal justice over the past 40 years has been the rise of the victims' lobby. Essentially shut out of the core of the process until the 1970s, the victims' rights movement today can cite legislation from sea to sea, chapter and verse under both federal and state laws, that broadens the rights of victims to participate in the trials of those accused of harming them or their families. The Department of Justice's 2012 "Attorney General Guidelines for Victim and Witness Assistance," for example, totals 66 pages and barely scratches the surface of what similar state guidelines reveal.

The immutable trio that once existed in criminal cases – judge, prosecutor and defendant – now almost always resembles a quartet. Victims have a voice – and they use it. All 50 states now allow some form of "victim impact statement" at sentencing. Because such statements are often so compelling to jurors, defense attorneys frequently seek ways to blunt their impact. But these efforts almost always fail. Even judges who are sympathetic to the constitutional rights of defendants, who fret about the prejudicial impact of victim testimony, say they are bound by legislative declarations broadening the scope of victim participation in criminal cases.

But a pending Colorado case raises a profound question that few judges (or prosecutors or jurors) ever have to confront: What happens when the victims of violent crime seek to speak out on behalf of the defendant and not the state? What happens when the family members of a murder victim seek leave to beg jurors at sentencing to spare the life of the man who killed their son? What responsibility does the prosecutor have in that case? What obligations do the courts have? Do victims' rights sound only when they favor the government and the harshest sentence, or do they sound as well when they cry out for mercy?

So far, the prosecutor in the case, Arapahoe County District Attorney George Brauchler, has answered those questions clearly: He wants to block one couple's efforts to speak out against the death penalty for the man who murdered their child. Brauchler has filed a motion in a pending case seeking to bar Bob and Lola Autabee from participating in the sentencing phase of the trial of Edward Montour, their son's killer. The law only guarantees the rights of victims to "discuss the harm that resulted from the crime," Brauchler argues. But I haven't been able to find a single victims' right advocate who believes that's true.

People of the State of Colorado v. Montour

THERE DOESN'T SEEM TO BE MUCH DOUBT, reasonable or otherwise, that Edward Montour killed Colorado corrections officer Eric Autabee in a prison kitchen on October 18, 2002. (Montour was in that kitchen, and in that prison, because he was serving without juries, could not impose death sentences.

Then, last year, a trial judge overturned Montour's conviction and allowed him to withdraw his initial guilty plea in the Autabee killing. Montour was not adequately defended by a lawyer at the time of that plea, the judge ruled, and had a documented history of mental illness. A new trial was ordered. Montour, through his attorney, said he would re-plead guilty to Autabee's murder if he could be spared the death penalty and receive a(nother) sentence of life in prison without the possibility of parole. The prosecutor, Brauchler, rejected the offer and went ahead instead with the now-pending capital case against Montour.

The last time Montour faced trial for Autabee's death, the victim's family supported the death penalty as an option. Not this time. This time, having educated themselves about capital punishment, and better understanding the nature of Montour's mental illness at the time of Eric's death, the Autobees have been vocally, stridently, ceaselessly against the imposition of death in this case. In January 2014, for example, as potential jurors in the Montour case were lined up outside the courthouse waiting to learn about the case for which they were summoned, the Autobees picketed the line and pleaded with Brauchler to spare their son's killer.

Episodes like this – and the media attention they inevitably generated – prompted Brauchler, the prosecutor in the Montour case, to remove the family from his preliminary list of witnesses to be called during the sentencing of the case. And that removal, in turn, has prompted Montour's attorneys to ask the trial judge in the case to allow the Autobees to testify during sentencing. That prompted an aggressive response from Brauchler, arguing that Colorado's victims' rights laws don't apply to "mitigating" factors during sentencing but only to "aggravating factors." And that is where we stand today.

The Autobees

THE PARENTS OF THE VICTIM HAVE SPOKEN, and eloquently so, about the reasons why they have chosen to oppose the death penalty in this case. Below, from a court filing, is the essence of their claim:

FULTON & WELCH

TEXAS PAROLE ATTORNEYS

- o AFFORDABLE
- o PERSONALIZED PACKET
- o 2 HEARINGS
- o MEET WITH YOU & FAMILY

"LET US GET YOU HOME SOONER"

10701 Corporate Dr., Ste. 390,
Stafford, Texas 77477

a life sentence for killing his infant daughter). Less than one year after Autabee's death, Montour pleaded guilty to first-degree murder and was quickly sentenced to death by a Colorado judge. But that death sentence was overturned, in 2007, after the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in Ring v. Arizona that judges alone,

"Bob would like any jury considering the appropriate penalty for Eric's killer to know who Eric truly was and how his loss has impacted the Autobees. The Autobees loved Eric deeply, and now remember him for his peace-loving nature, his love of the outdoors, and his innate desire to find moments of calm when hunting or fishing. Eric was a gentle soul who would hold Bob's hands even when he was in his 20's. Eric started his career in the culinary arts and then, like Bob, became a prison corrections officer.

"Despite the inhumanity he saw around him, Eric would not speak disdainfully of prisoners, but, instead, recognized their human dignity. Eric accomplished much in his short time on earth – he saved three lives before he died – but missed out on even more. It pains the Autobees to consider the many milestones in Eric's life that might have occurred were he still alive, including marriage, children, and career advancement.

"The crime affected the Autobees not just because of their beloved son's loss, but also because of who they became after this loss. After Eric's death, their warm feelings of love that Eric always nurtured quickly turned into cold feelings of vengeance and violence. Originally, the Autobees fervently supported the prosecution's efforts to seek absolute retribution. Over time, however, and with reflection, they realized that Eric would not have wanted this for himself or for them; Eric would not have wanted someone killed in his name, nor would he have wanted his family to live in the darkness of hatred. The Autobees know this because they know how Eric lived: by loving life, saving lives, and extending mercy to the merciless.

"The effect of the crime on the Autobees cannot be separated from this ongoing death penalty prosecution. Bob and his family have found healing in the forgiveness that they have extended to their son's killer. However, the prosecution strives to forever undo this healing by seeking to avenge one killing with another, over the family's pleas for mercy. For the Autobee family, a death sentence and the accompanying years of litigation, all supposedly done in their son's name, would rob them of peace. For, in the eyes of society, their son's name forever would be associated with cruelty and violence, rather than the human dignity and mercy he embodied in life."

Call and Response

BRAUCHLER SURELY HAS NO MORAL ANSWER for this, and the legal answer he has ginned up barely passes the straight-face test, but that has not stopped him from seeking to silence the Autobees' voice during the upcoming trial. "To permit testimony concerning the victims' general view of the death penalty or whether this particular defendant should be executed or given a life sentence invades the province of the jury and should not be permitted," prosecutors told the judge. Can you imagine them making that argument if the Autobees were still advocating for Montour's death?

Colorado law "only guarantees the right of the victims to discuss the harm that resulted from the crime," Brauchler argues, and this limits "evidence from the victims to the characteristics of the victim and the impact of the crime on the victim's family." It is "not the court process that can be attacked by the victims," prosecutors assert, before claiming that Montour's Eighth Amendment rights will be implicated if the Autobees speak out in his favor. You don't need to be a lawyer, or a juror, to understand that this is a terrible argument. And Brauchler cites no controlling Colorado law in support of it.

In their response, the Autobees' attorneys seem incredulous as they recite the provisions of Colorado law that support their view. "A crime victim," they told the court, has the "right to appear, personally or with counsel, at the sentencing proceeding and to adequately and reasonably express his or her views regarding 'the type of sentence which should be imposed by the court.'" Under Colorado law, the Autobees added, "prosecutors are required to support – not oppose – this right by 'inform[ing] each victim of 'his or her 'right' to 'express an opinion at the sentencing hearing or any sentence proposed to the court for consideration'" (emphasis in original).

And then the Autobees shared with the trial judge what they really think is happening here. "Because the Autobee family's beliefs conflict with the prosecutions' agenda," the family's lawyers wrote, "the prosecution has relegated [them] to the status of second-class victims." Brauchler has it all wrong, the family asserts. Prosecutors should be heeding the wishes of the family members instead of putting their own priorities first. What the family really is saying, however, is that the world of victims' rights is far different than it was 40 years ago and that prosecutors can't always have things their own way.

The Lobby

ALTHOUGH THIS CONFLICT NOW IS unfolding in Colorado, it has national implications. The Autobees are not the first family to seek mercy for someone who took the life of a loved one. And Brauchler isn't the first prosecutor to seek to block such a family from getting through to a jury. In fact, this sort of dispute happens more often than you might think. So I called around to a few national victims' rights organizations with a simple question: Does your organization support the families of victims who oppose the imposition of the death penalty in a particular case? Here are some of the responses I received.

From Kristy Dyroff, of the National Organization for Victim Assistance (NOVA):

"We support crime victims in seeking justice in the way they are comfortable. There are victims who seek capital punishment and those who strongly oppose it. Restorative Justice is the term used for this type of model. It focuses on addressing the needs of the victim, the offender and the community, not the justice system.

"It is definitely NOT for all victims/survivors but there is a significant contingent within the crime victim assistance network who support this model. At NOVA, our focus is always on assisting the crime victims and their families. We are very careful not to tell them what they need, or how to heal. We try to educate and support them in their choices.

"We support the crime victim in pursuing the justice they seek, regardless of the interests of the prosecutor, law enforcement or others. Yes, we have supported victims in the past who object to capital punishment. We also encourage all other participants in the process to support and respect the victims in their position."

And from Kate Lowenstein, the program director of the group Murder Victims' Families for Human Rights, whose own father was murdered:

"More people likely understand that you can't automatically assume that losing a loved one to murder will mean that you support the death penalty, nor does opposition to the death penalty mean you don't want the killer or killers brought to justice, and it does not necessarily mean you have forgiven the murderer. Murder and the justice system are complicated, as are the views and experiences of the victims and families who are affected by it. We must not try to simplify this, but allow victims their unique and complicated responses to the trauma and horror of having a family member murdered and the criminal justice process that occurs after that.

"Despite the wider cultural awareness of victim opposition to the death penalty, unequal treatment of victim family members by prosecutors in capital trials is still a problem, one that exists largely below the public radar, in District Attorneys' offices across the country, where often victims' family members don't know their rights and there is no one around to step forward and advocate on their behalf.

"It occurs, for example, that if two surviving family members want to give a victim impact statement during the sentencing phase of the trial, the prosecutor will allow the pro-death penalty survivor to speak but not the survivor who opposes the death penalty, regardless of the fact that no mention of the victims' views of what the sentence should be is allowed in Victim Impact Statements.

"The point is not that victims should get to determine sentencing. The point is that victims' rights should be granted to all victims, regardless of their position on the death penalty, or perceived 'cooperation' with the District Attorneys office. Disagreeing with the prosecutor – opposing the death penalty when the prosecutor is seeking a death sentence – should not mean that you are silenced, treated as 'part of the defense team' and not a 'real' victim, or denied the right to speak about the impact of the murder on you and your family."

It's not the Autobees who are the outliers here. It's the prosecutor. He can hardly purport to serve as the "conscience of the community," or claim he is following clear Colorado law by ignoring the wishes of the one family in the state that has earned the right to speak at the Montour trial. Victims' rights mean rights for all victims and not just those who toe the government's line. The jury in Edward Montour's case deserves to hear what the Autobees have to say, the family has a right to say it in court, and no lawman has the right to come between that vital communication.

A ruling from the trial judge is expected any day. ■

States Renewing Their Prison Phone Contracts

As state DOCs renew or rebid their prison phone contracts, you can help urge them to eliminate commission kickbacks and lower intrastate phone rates.

The Campaign for Prison Phone Justice needs your help in ***** Minnesota, Kentucky and Alaska! *******

The Departments of Corrections in the above states are in the process of re-bidding or renewing their prison phone contracts. Most DOCs receive a commission (kickback) on revenue generated from calls made by prisoners, which results in excessively high phone rates. Although the FCC voted last year to cap the costs of interstate (long distance) prison calls, which went into effect on February 11, 2014, the order does not apply to intrastate (in-state) calls; an estimated 85% of prison phone calls are in-state. This is an opportunity to ask DOCs to forgo commissions and ensure their new prison phone contracts are based on the lowest cost to those who pay for the calls – mostly prisoners' families.

Take Action NOW! Here's What YOU Can Do!

Ask your family members and friends to write, email, call and fax the DOC and the governor's office (addresses and contacts are listed below), requesting that the DOC: 1) forgo commission payments when re-bidding or renewing its prison phone contract, and 2) base the new contract on the lowest calling cost. Lower prison phone rates should apply not just to long distance calls but also to in-state calls. For a sample letter or to easily send an email, visit the Campaign for Prison Phone Justice's website and click on the "Take Action" tab:

Texas Criminal Court Fees are a Tax on Poor Defendants

by Matt Clarke

THE TEXAS LEGISLATURE HAS ERECTED such a hodgepodge of criminal court fees that even the court administrators and clerks don't know how to apply them. These fees, which are frequently not used for their intended purposes, amount to a hidden tax on the poorest members of society ensnared in Texas' criminal justice system.

"Sometimes, I can't even tell my client what the bill is for," said Austin defense attorney David Gonzales.

He is not alone. The Texas Office of Court Administration (TOCA) receives "hundreds of calls from court officials about how to assess and prioritize fines, fees and surcharges in criminal cases," according to a report the agency published in 2009. "The sprawling number of state and local fees and court costs that state law prescribes as a result of a criminal conviction amounts to a nearly incomprehensible package."

The fee system is so complex that people convicted of identical crimes might be charged vastly different fees, possibly violating the constitutional guarantee of equal treatment under the law.

Nor is it always possible to determine how a particular fee is actually used; typical legislative practice includes the raiding of fee accounts to balance the budget or fund pet projects. Some fees, such as the $50 clerk's fee and $25 prosecutor's fee, go straight into a county's general fund where they can be used to pay for any budget item, court-related or not.

Every person convicted of a crime in Texas pays a "Consolidated Court Cost" fee of $40 for a Class C misdemeanor, $83 for Class A and B misdemeanors, and $133 for a felony. All criminal defendants are also charged at least six additional fees with titles such as "records management and preservation fee," "clerk's fee," "county and district court technology fund fee" and "courthouse security fee."

Those arrested with a warrant are charged a $50 fee; those without a warrant pay $5. Entering or leaving jail incurs a $5 fee, and DUI defendants are charged a "visual recording fee." A $30 "state traffic fine" is imposed on all traffic violations.

"We have a 'school crossing fee' that nobody—nobody—can tell me what comes of it," observed state Senator John Whitmire, who chairs the Senate Jurisprudence Committee.

The total bill can easily exceed $600. The cost for those placed on probation is much higher: $4,000 to $5,000, according to a 2009 TOCA survey.

Some of the fees go to the state's Compensation to Victims of Crime (CVC) Fund, administered by the Office of the Attorney General. The CVC receives revenue from Consolidated Court Cost fees, restitution installment fees and parole administration fees, among other sources. From 2004 to 2012, the CVC received approximately $100 million per year, mostly from Consolidated Court Cost funds.

Criminal court fees aren't necessarily fair. Defendants convicted of sex crimes pay a $250 "DNA testing fee" plus an additional "DNA collection fee" regardless of whether DNA was collected or tested in their cases. Some of the fees for DNA testing actually end up in a state highway fund.

"Breath alcohol testing fees" in DUI cases don't necessarily go to pay for breath alcohol testing any more than DNA fees necessarily pay for DNA testing. Texas judicial administrators estimate that of every three dollars collected in fees, one will be spent for something unrelated to the court system.

For example, court fees have paid for rehabilitative services for people with brain injuries and an obesity study of minority children in the Houston area. They also fund the salaries of state game wardens. Two million dollars in court fees went to pay a private company to install Internet cameras along the Mexican border so people could view them online and report illegal border crossings.

Court-imposed fees are also raided to balance the budget. In 2011, Texas legislators took $20 million in fees to pay for state employee pensions, and moved $135 million from the Fugitive Apprehension Fee account, intended to help apprehend parolees who abscond, to the state's general fund where it can be used for any purpose.

Another questionable method of using fees to balance the budget on paper is to let them remain uncollected, so they appear as a large amount of "accounts receivable." That may be why almost $5 billion in uncollected fees is included in designated accounts that can be used to appear to “balance” budgets over and over again.

“The budget is far too much based on diversion and deception,” according to state Senator Kirk Watson. “When people are told their money is going to be spent for something specific, a promise is made: If we collect this tax from you, we will spend it for this practice.”

“If we’re not going to use a fee for a particular purpose, we shouldn’t collect it,” added Jim Allison of the County Judges & Commissioners Association of Texas.

In fact, collecting fees that are not used for their intended purpose and are in effect general taxes may be unconstitutional. Further, the fees impose an onerous and often unjustified burden on people who are already among society’s poorest – criminal defendants.

“We’re trying to squeeze more money from people who have a hard time getting jobs because they have a criminal record, or have mental illness problems or substance abuse problems,” stated Ana Yáñez-Correa, executive director of the Texas Criminal Justice Policy Coalition. “These fees are a tax on the poor,” she concluded.

Poor defendants who can’t pay the fees up front face the additional burden of fees on fees. There is a $25 fee to set up a schedule by which to pay fees. It costs another $12 for a “restitution installment fee” to pay off court-ordered restitution over time, and a $2 “transaction fee” each time a payment is made.

Although lawmakers are aware of the absurdity of the criminal court fee system, they don’t want to butcher their cash cow. The Consolidated Court Cost fees alone bring in almost $200 million annually. In 2009 and 2011, the Texas Judicial Council – the policy-making body for the state’s courts – unsuccessfully urged the legislature to simplify the costs and fees.

There is, however, one positive precedent from a different type of fee. When the legislature attempted in 2011 to empty the System Benefit Fund account, which is funded by fees on telephone bills and intended to help the elderly and poor pay their utility costs during the summer, state Rep. Sylvester Turner raised the issue publicly, causing lawmakers to back down. Unfortunately, people who have been convicted of crimes elicit much less sympathy, so the myriad of criminal court fees and their misuses will most likely continue unabated.

“Lawmakers are like anybody else – they do what they can,” noted former Texas chief deputy comptroller Billy Hamilton. “And nobody’s ever going to question it if they raise fees on criminals.”

Oregon Jail Guard Quits, Divorces Wife for Former Prisoner

"I CRUSHED A DUDE'S EYE SOCKET FROM repeatedly punching him in it, then I charged him with menacing and harassment," bragged Multnomah County, Oregon jail guard David B. Thompson in one of more than 1,700 messages he posted on an Internet gaming site over an eight-month period while at work in 2007.

"Seeing someone get Tasered is second only to pulling the trigger," Thompson wrote in another post. "That is money – puts a smile on your face."

As previously reported in PLN, Thompson, who had been employed as a veteran guard at the Multnomah County Detention Center (MCDC), was merely suspended without pay for 11 days rather than terminated or prosecuted for misuse of jail computers or using excessive force against prisoners. [See: PLN, March 2009, p.25].

The suspension did little to get Thompson's attention, apparently. He faced complaints for injuring a male prisoner in March 2009, for an undocumented use of force on a female prisoner in September 2010 and for an inappropriate conversation with another female prisoner in November 2011.

While assaulting prisoners is seemingly okay, falling in love with them evidently crosses the line in the eyes of Thompson's MCDC co-workers. When he confided in two other guards that he intended to divorce his wife to pursue a relationship with an exotic dancer shortly after her release from jail, they ratted him out.

Thompson also sent an email to a captain, confirming that he was in a relationship with a former prisoner but claiming he did not know if she was still on parole – a fact that his wife's divorce attorney later exposed. A formal investigation began in February 2012, according to Chief Deputy Mike Shults.

The former prisoner at the center of the scandal, Melissa M. Crawn, 31, was in custody at the Inverness Jail from August to December 2011 for violating her parole on a 2008 identity theft conviction. It was her fifth jail stay that year for parole violations and an intoxicated driving conviction.

On March 20, 2012, investigators confirmed that Crawn and Thompson were living together. The following day, Thompson was placed on administrative leave when investigators pulled him over and found Crawn in his vehicle.

In separate interviews, Thompson and Crawn both admitted that they began a personal relationship while she was incarcerated. Crawn told investigators that she thought Thompson was attractive, a good listener and treated her better than other jailers. He even helped her file a harassment complaint against another male guard.

Just a week after her December 2011 release from jail, Crawn called Thompson at work. They continued their relationship by phone until Thompson visited her in January 2012. Thompson later left his wife and child for Crawn, who was still legally married but separated from the father of her children.

"I wonder if it's because he was in this relationship with her for so long and it was boring and I'm a little bit crazier," Crawn surmised in response to investigators' questions about why Thompson had left his wife and child for her. After all, she is "that foul-mouthed, tatted up country girl your momma warned you about," according to her Facebook page.

Crawn told investigators that her mother was a prison guard at the Eastern Oregon Correctional Institution when she met and eventually married Crawn's father, who was a prisoner at the facility.

The MCDC internal investigation found no evidence that Thompson and Crawn were intimate while she was in custody, said Multnomah County Sheriff's Lt. Mark Matsushima. Their relationship did, however, violate agency policy because it became physical after her release, according to Chief Deputy Shults.

Thompson finally resigned. "We had to make sure we had all the facts before we took any definitive action,” said Shults. “But there’s no mistaking it, this is a case of extremely bad judgment that happened here.”

The Multnomah County District Attorney’s Office was investigating possible computer crimes related to Thompson’s use of the state’s Law Enforcement Data System to access information about Crawn for personal reasons after her release from jail.

Meanwhile, Crawn was sentenced to serve 15 days in the Clackamas County Jail for driving while intoxicated and with a suspended license, after she plowed into a fire hydrant in July 2011, just days after a stint in jail on a DUI conviction.

Thompson attended Crawn’s sentencing hearing and the two held hands and kissed in court. Apparently the now-former guard and former prisoner were meant for each other. 🐾

South Dakota Parole Board Improperly Enhanced Prisoner’s Parole Date

THE SOUTH DAKOTA SUPREME COURT has held that the state Board of Pardons and Paroles (Board) exceeded its authority when it calculated a prisoner’s initial parole release date by treating Class 4 felonies as Class 2 felonies.

Lloyd Rowley was convicted of two Class 4 felonies on October 12, 2007. His sentence was enhanced two levels – to the equivalent of Class 2 felonies – because he was a habitual offender, and he received 21 years in prison for both convictions.

Pursuant to SDCL 24-15A-32, defendants convicted of Class 4 felonies must serve 40 percent of their sentences before parole eligibility while those convicted of Class 2 felonies have to serve 50 percent of their sentences.

Since his sentence had been enhanced, the Department of Corrections (DOC) calculated Rowley’s initial parole date using the Class 2 percentage rather than the Class 4 percentage. The Board subsequently affirmed the DOC’s initial parole date calculation; Rowley filed an appeal in circuit court, which upheld the Board’s decision.

The South Dakota Supreme Court reversed, finding that the plain language of the habitual offender statute, SDCL 22-7-8.1, “indicates that the sentence is enhanced, not the principal felony.”

The Court concluded: “By its plain language, SDCL 22-7-8.1 does not substantively change the principal felony nor does the reference to SDCL 24-15A-32 in the last sentence of SDCL 22-7-8.1 demonstrate legislative intent to enhance the felony class when determining an inmate’s parole eligibility date pursuant to SDCL 24-15A-32.” Therefore, “the Board acted without authority in determining that Rowley was a Class 2 felon when calculating his initial parole date.”

Justice Glen Severson issued a dissenting opinion. See: Rowley v. South Dakota Board of Pardons & Paroles, 2013 SD 6, 826 N.W.2d 360 (S.D. 2013). 🐾

California Female Prisoners Sterilized

MORE THAN 130 FEMALE PRISONERS at two California facilities were sterilized over a four-year period without required state approval, and some of the women have claimed they were pressured, harassed and even tricked into signing forms agreeing to the sterilizations. The procedure, known as tubal ligation, involves severing a woman's fallopian tubes to prevent eggs from reaching the uterus; the operation requires general anesthesia and is considered permanent.

The surgeries were performed from 2006 to 2010 at outside medical facilities by doctors under contract with the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR). Joyce Hayhoe, a spokeswoman for California Correctional Health Care Services – the federal court-appointed receiver over CDCR medical care – said the procedures violated state regulations that restrict tubal ligations not deemed medically necessary. They did not, however, violate state law.

According to public records, doctors were paid $147,460 to perform the sterilizations on female prisoners from the California Institution for Women and Valley State Prison in Chowchilla. The Center for Investigative Reporting (CIR), which first reported the story on July 7, 2013, initially identified 148 prisoners who were sterilized from 2006 to 2010, but that number was later revised downward to 132 after a further review indicated some of the women had been counted twice. “Perhaps 100 more” prisoners were reportedly sterilized between 1997 and 2006.

Although they signed consent forms, several of the women complained they were pressured into agreeing to the procedures by medical staff and doctors, especially the OB-GYN at Valley State Prison, Dr. James Heinrich.

“As soon as he found out that I had five kids, he suggested that I look into getting it done,” said Christina Cordero, 34, who was incarcerated at Valley State. “The closer I got to my due date, the more he talked about it. He made me feel like a bad mother if I didn’t do it,” she stated. “Today, I wish I would have never had it done.”

Former prisoner Kimberly Jeffrey, who gave birth to a son while at Valley State, said she “went into a straight panic” when confronted with sterilization while she was sedated and on an operating table for a caesarean section. She said her doctor tried to use the operation to perform a tubal ligation even though she had twice refused the procedure during earlier visits.

“As I was laying on the operating table, moments before I went into surgery, [the doctor] had made a statement that, ‘Okay, we’re going to do this tubal ligation, right?’ And I’m like, ‘tubal ligation? What are you talking about? I don’t want any procedure. I just want to have my baby.’”

“Our physicians were not following the proper procedures,” Hayhoe admitted. “The first priority we had was to stop it from taking place, which we did in 2010.” Heinrich and other doctors involved in the sterilizations “are no longer employed” by the CDCR, she added.

Extensive media coverage prompted state lawmakers to order investigations by the Medical Board of California and California State Auditor.

In a letter addressed to the federal receiver, the 31-member California Legislative Women’s Caucus wrote: “Pressuring a vulnerable population – including at least one documented instance of a patient under sedation – to undergo these extreme procedures erodes the ban on eugenics.” The letter continued, “In our view, such practice violates constitutional protections against cruel and unusual punishment; protections that you were appointed to enforce.”

“We’ve been assured that this practice hasn’t occurred since [2010], but the question of course is why was this occurring?” asked state Senator Hannah-Beth Jackson. “We want to make absolutely sure – whether we have to do legislation or what – this procedure never becomes the practice it had in the past.”

In a July 10, 2013 letter to the Medical Board of California, state Senator Ted Lieu singled out Dr. Heinrich for criticism; Heinrich had told CIR that the $147,460 paid to doctors who performed the sterilizations was not a large amount compared to what the state would save in welfare costs.

“Particularly troubling was a statement by Dr. James Heinrich, ... who made a reference that tubal ligations on inmates save in welfare paying for these unwanted children – as they procreated more,” wrote Senator Lieu. “Whether a surgical procedure would have any hypothetical effect on welfare rolls should never, ever play a part in a doctor’s decision.”

“We also want to find out, who are the women who have been sterilized while in prison? Let’s break them down by race, by economic situation, by age, by number of children they have,” added Senator Jackson. “One could argue, almost by definition, that being incarcerated takes away your ability to voluntarily consent.”

Former Valley State prisoner Crystal Nguyen, 28, who worked in the prison’s infirmary in 1997, said she frequently heard medical staff asking female prisoners to agree to sterilization.

According to CIR, Nguyen told investigators, “I was like, ‘Oh my God, that’s not right.’ Do they think they’re animals, and they don’t want them to breed anymore?”

Dr. Heinrich retired in 2011 but was rehired and continued working at Valley State Prison until December 2012. He has been linked to arranging 378 other sterilizations between 2006 and 2012, including hysterectomies, the removal of ovaries and a procedure called endometrial ablation, which destroys the lining of the uterus.

Dr. Ricki Barnett with the federal receiver’s office said such procedures are not banned in California prisons, but the sheer number attributed to Heinrich caused officials to take notice. Dr. Heinrich declined to comment on the sterilizations; according to news reports, he had settled a number of lawsuits related to medical care before being hired by the CDCR.

Justice Now, a prisoner advocacy group, reported that at least 10 women have alleged they were sterilized improperly, including one who underwent an operation to remove cysts on her ovaries. Kelli Thomas, a prisoner at Valley State, told the Los Angeles Times that she gave the doctor permission to remove her ovaries only if cancer was discovered. Her medical records indicated that no cancer was found but her ovaries were removed anyway, leaving her sterile.

“I feel like I was tricked,” she said. “I gave permission to do it based on a [cancer] diagnosis, and the diagnosis wasn’t there.” ■

Kentucky Supreme Court: Probation Cannot be Extended for Sex Offender Treatment

THE SUPREME COURT OF KENTUCKY has held that a probationer's period of probation cannot be extended to require completion of a sex offender treatment program.

Elmer David Miller was originally charged with felony first-degree unlawful transaction with a minor. He entered into a plea agreement for a misdemeanor charge of criminal attempt to commit first-degree unlawful transaction with a minor, because the victim was over the age of sixteen. The plea agreement included two years of probation and required Miller to "[a]ttend any counseling recommended by probation and parole."

Following the recommendation of the Division of Probation and Parole, Miller enrolled in the state's sex offender treatment program. Shortly before his period of probation ended, his probation officer informed the trial court that Miller would be unable to complete the program before the expiration of his probation term. The court then held a hearing and extended Miller's probation until he finished the three-year sex offender treatment program.

Miller challenged the trial court's order and the Court of Appeals reversed, holding that he had not agreed to the extension of his probation and, in fact, had opposed it at the hearing. The appellate court remanded the case for a determination of whether Miller's term of probation should have been allowed to expire or should have been revoked for his failure to complete the treatment program. See: Miller v. Commonwealth of Kentucky, 2010 Ky. App. Unpub. LEXIS 1001 (Ky. Ct. App. 2010).

On discretionary review by the Kentucky Supreme Court, the state agreed that the Court of Appeals was correct in concluding Miller's term of probation could not be extended. The Court concurred, stating the statutory two-year period for misdemeanors is an "absolute limit, absent some overriding statute or waiver by the defendant," neither of which applied in this case.

The Supreme Court further found that Miller had not been convicted of a sex crime, because under state law criminal attempt is a "separate, inchoate offense." As such, the Division of Probation and Parole incorrectly believed Miller had to complete a sex offender treatment program. That program, the Court held, only applies to felony sex offenses and thus was not applicable to Miller, who was convicted of a misdemeanor.

Finally, the Court found that a term of probation cannot be extended beyond the limit set by statute to facilitate completion of a sex offender treatment program. Combining that legal principle with precedent that a trial court must hold a hearing and revoke probation before the period of probation ends, the trial court was without jurisdiction to act in Miller's case as its order extending his probation was entered months after his probationary term was over.

Consequently, the case was remanded to discharge Miller from probation. See: Miller v. Commonwealth of Kentucky, 391 S.W.3d 801 (Ky. 2013). ■

Former Detainee Alleges Unconstitutional Conditions at Illinois Jail, Accepts $7,501 Judgment

ON APRIL 24, 2013, THE SEVENTH Circuit Court of Appeals held that a former pretrial detainee at the Edgar County Jail (ECJ) in Illinois stated a claim concerning unconstitutional conditions of confinement at the facility. The appellate court also affirmed the dismissal of a claim alleging deliberate indifference to the detainee's medical needs.

Over a period of two-and-a-half years, Richard D. Budd served three stints at ECJ as a pretrial detainee. He initially spent 45 days at the jail following a 2009 arrest. During that time he was confined with eight other detainees in an area of the facility intended for three; he had to sleep on the floor alongside broken windows and damaged toilets.

After another arrest two years later, Budd was placed in a section of the ECJ where overcrowded conditions again forced him and other prisoners to sleep on the floor amid water from a shower leak. The cells had broken windows, exposed wiring, extensive rust, sinks without running water, toilets covered in mold and spider webs, and a broken heating system. ECJ staff did not provide prisoners with cleaning supplies.

Four months later, Budd was again arrested and had to sleep on the floor in an ECJ cellblock. The cell's vents were blocked, the heating and air conditioning systems did not work, and detainees were denied recreation. While living in these conditions, something scratched or bit Budd's leg, resulting in an infection and swelling. He was taken to a local hospital for treatment after contacting the Sheriff.

Budd's civil rights complaint alleged that conditions at ECJ fell below constitutional standards and that jailers were deliberately indifferent to his medical needs. The district court dismissed the suit for failure to state a cause of action.

On appeal, the Seventh Circuit held the complaint stated a claim as to the conditions at ECJ. The appellate court noted that Budd had attached two newspaper articles to his complaint in which Edgar County Sheriff Edward Motley was quoted describing the jail as not "livable" and violating "acceptable standards." The Court of Appeals said the unhygienic conditions described in Budd's complaint had been held to state a claim in other cases under the Fourteenth Amendment, as he was a pretrial detainee. Moreover, three doctors had told Budd that his infection was caused by unsanitary conditions at the jail, so the harm was not speculative. He also alleged the conditions at ECJ had traumatized him, and the Seventh Circuit found Budd's "exposure to psychological harm or a heightened risk of future injury" from being held at the jail was itself actionable.

Further, jails must meet minimal standards of habitability, such as adequate bedding and protection from cold. Allegations of overcrowding, lack of recreation and poor air circulation in combination likewise contribute to a conditions of confinement claim. Having found that Budd stated such a claim, the appellate court concluded the lawsuit named the Sheriff in his official capacity and thus should be allowed to proceed.

Budd's medical claim, however, failed. The Court of Appeals noted that he was seen by a nurse as soon as he complained about his leg injury. He was also promptly taken to a hospital after contacting the Sheriff. Therefore, the district court's order was vacated in part and affirmed in part, and on remand the lower court was ordered to rule on Budd's motion for appointment of counsel. See: Budd v. Motley, 711 F.3d 840 (7th Cir. 2013).

Following remand, on September 4, 2013 the district court denied the defendants' Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(f) motion to strike portions of Budd's amended complaint. Those portions included "facts which tend to show that the Defendants were well aware of the deplorable conditions at the Edgar County Jail before, during, and after Plaintiff's injuries, but exhibited deliberate indifference to the jail's deplorable conditions." In denying the motion, the court found that the challenged portions of the amended complaint were relevant to Budd's claims against the county. See: Budd v. Edgar County Sheriff's Office, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 125823 (C.D. Ill. 2013).

On January 3, 2014, Budd accepted a Fed.R.Civ.P. Rule 68 offer of judgment by Edgar County and resolved his lawsuit for $7,501 in damages plus taxable court costs and attorney's fees. ■

Seventh Circuit Upholds FTCA Venue Transfer

THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS has upheld the transfer of a former federal prisoner's negligence action from Illinois to Kansas.

Daniel Hudson relocated to Illinois following his release from a federal prison in Kansas. He filed a Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) suit in U.S. District Court in Illinois, alleging that Kansas medical staff had negligently misdiagnosed a blood clot in his leg.

The district court granted the defendants' motion to transfer the case to a federal court in Kansas pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a), because the principal witnesses were located in Kansas and the per-judge caseload in that state was lighter than the caseload in Illinois.

Hudson then filed a mandamus petition with the Seventh Circuit, seeking to return venue to Illinois. He argued that he and five of his witnesses – including three treating physicians – resided in Illinois.

The Court of Appeals agreed that mandamus was the proper method to challenge the district court's transfer order: "The grant of the government's motion to transfer the case was an unappealable interlocutory order, but an unappealable order can in exceptional circumstances be reviewed by a mandamus proceeding. The grant of a motion to transfer is an appealing candidate for such review."

The appellate court found that "Although the question of transfer in this case is a close one, we cannot say that the district judge committed a clear error in holding that the defendants had made the required showing: More than two-thirds of the potential witnesses (12 out of 17) are either in Kansas, just across the border in Missouri, elsewhere in Missouri, or in California, which is closer to Kansas than it is to Illinois."

The Seventh Circuit further noted that "in our age of advanced electronic communication ... changes of venue motivated by concerns with travel inconvenience should be fewer than in the past." However, Hudson did "not argue against the transfer on the ground that the electronic revolution has erased the advantages that the Kansas venue would once undoubtedly have had under the facts of this case." Therefore, his mandamus petition was denied. See: In re Hudson, 710 F.3d 716 (7th Cir. 2013). ■

Alabama Sheriff Made Party on Counterclaim Alleging Prisoners Subjected to Sexual Abuse

THE ALABAMA SUPREME COURT HAS held that a third party to a lawsuit may be made a party when a counterclaim is filed. The Court also held a sheriff named as a defendant was not entitled to qualified immunity on a federal claim in her individual capacity, but was entitled to immunity on a federal official capacity claim and state law claims.

The case involved a lawsuit filed by Scott Cotney, an administrator at the Clay County Jail, against former jail guard Phillip E. Green and prisoners Anthony Haywood and Daniel Hall, alleging defamation, slander, libel, invasion of privacy, negligence and wantonness. The claims resulted from a report filed by Green, Haywood and Hall with the Alabama Department of Corrections, claiming that Cotney had used his position to sexually abuse or assault Haywood and Hall while they were held at the jail.

Haywood and Hall filed a counterclaim against Cotney for violations of their Fourth, Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights. They also filed counterclaims against the Clay County Commission and Sheriff Dorothy “Jean Dot” Alexander, in her official and individual capacities. They alleged Alexander “had knowledge of [Cotney’s] unlawful acts ... and permitted the abuse to occur,” and made the same claims against her as those against Cotney in addition to a claim of negligent supervision.

The counterclaims against the Commission were dismissed with Hall and Haywood’s consent, and the circuit court granted Alexander’s motion to dismiss without specifying its reasons for doing so. On appeal, the Alabama Supreme Court addressed the grounds in Sheriff Alexander’s motion.

First, the Court held that Alexander could be made party to a counterclaim or cross-claim under Rules 13(h) and 20(a) of the Alabama Rules of Civil Procedure, and the circuit court’s dismissal on that basis was error. Next, Haywood and Hall were convicted felons during at least part of the time the tortious conduct at the jail occurred, so dismissal of their Eighth Amendment claim also was erroneous.

The Supreme Court further found that Hall and Haywood alleged a causal connection between Sheriff Alexander and the deprivation of their Fourth Amendment rights related to strip searches, under a theory of supervisory liability; thus, she was not entitled to have the “claims against her dismissed on the basis that she cannot be held vicariously liable for the alleged violations.”

Finally, the Court addressed immunity issues, holding that Alexander was entitled to immunity under Article I § 14 of the Alabama Constitution on state law claims in her individual and official capacities. It also held she was entitled to Eleventh Amendment sovereign immunity as to a federal official capacity claim.

However, Sheriff Alexander was not entitled to qualified immunity on a federal individual capacity claim at this stage of the proceedings, as Hall and Haywood had alleged sufficient facts to show her failure to act led to a violation of their rights. They also alleged the harm they suffered resulted from customs or policies attributable to Alexander.

The circuit court’s order was therefore affirmed in part and reversed in part, and the case remanded. See: Haywood v. Alexander, 121 So.3d 972 (Ala. 2013). ■

Adverse Inference Instruction Required for New York Jail’s Destruction of Video Evidence

THE NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS has held that when a criminal defendant acts with due diligence to demand the preservation of evidence that is reasonably likely to be of material importance, and the evidence is destroyed by the state, the defendant is entitled to an adverse inference jury instruction.

Dayshawn P. Handy was charged with assaulting three deputy sheriffs at the Monroe County Jail. The first two assaults took place on November 8, 2006 and the third incident occurred on January 8, 2007. Handy was acquitted by a jury on counts one and three, but convicted on count two.

The count two assault charge involved an altercation with Deputy Brandon Saeva, who approached Handy in his cell after Handy returned from the shower. Saeva noticed that the boxers and sandals Handy was wearing were not “jail issue.” According to Saeva, Handy refused to turn over the sandals and swung at him. They scuffled, and other deputies helped Saeva gain control of Handy.

Deputy Timothy Schiff testified that he assisted in subduing Handy after the altercation with Saeva. When he reached for Handy’s right leg to control him, Schiff said Handy kicked back, injuring his thumb. Handy, however, testified that Saeva swung at him and then tackled him; he also claimed he never kicked at the deputies. Handy was convicted of the assault charge involving Deputy Schiff, but not Saeva.

At issue was a video camera in the cell block that faced toward Handy’s cell, but not “directly” toward it. Saeva viewed the video recorded on November 8. He said that since the camera showed “only a part of his doorway, but not much,” the video captured a “very small part” of the incident. It was undisputed that the video was destroyed prior to trial.

Handy argued it was error for the trial court to refuse to charge the jury with an adverse inference instruction due to the missing video evidence with respect to the count two assault charge. The Court of Appeals agreed.

In response to the state’s assertion that it was “merely speculative” that the video was exculpatory, the Court noted that such speculation was caused by the destruction of the video, and that requiring an adverse inference instruction would mitigate the harm to the defendant caused by the loss of evidence.

“We hold that when a defendant in a criminal case, acting with due diligence, demands evidence that is reasonably likely to be of material importance, and that evidence has been destroyed by the State, the defendant is entitled to an adverse inference charge,” the Court wrote.

Moreover, the Court of Appeals said its ruling would increase the chances that prison and jail staff will take whatever steps are necessary to ensure that video evidence is not erased or destroyed when it is foreseeable an incident will lead to a criminal prosecution.

Accordingly, Handy's conviction was reversed and the case remanded for a new trial on the assault charge involving Deputy Schiff. See: People v. Handy, 20 N.Y.3d 663, 988 N.E.2d 879 (N.Y. 2013). ■

Washington Jail Denied Good Time without Due Process; Rehearing Ordered

THE WASHINGTON COURT OF APPEALS held in an unpublished opinion that a prisoner was denied good time credits without adequate due process protections.

Allen Michael Knoll was held in the Skagit County jail between March 2011 and August 30, 2011, when he was transferred to the Washington Department of Corrections. One day prior to his transfer, jail officials notified Knoll that he would not receive any good time credits because he "had been the subject of over 40 incident reports and had been disciplined 10 times for both major and minor rule violations."

Knoll requested a hearing, contending that he had not been disciplined 10 times. The hearing was held five hours later and "the hearing officer upheld the denial of good time credit," finding that Knoll had been the subject of "43 reports, 10 disciplinary actions, and 2 instances of use of force" at the jail.

Knoll then filed a personal restraint petition, arguing that inadequate advance notice of the hearing and lack of specificity of the disciplinary actions deprived him of good time credits without due process.

The Court of Appeals accepted the state's concession that the jail's failure to provide Knoll with at least 24 hours to prepare for the hearing violated minimal due process requirements. The Court further found that "the notice provided only the number of incident reports and disciplinary actions. Without further identification or description of the disciplinary incidents at issue, the notice failed to provide sufficient information to enable Knoll to defend against the allegations."

However, following In re PRP of Atwood, 146 P.3d 1232 (Wash. Ct. App. 2006), the Court rejected Knoll's argument that restoration of good time credits was the proper remedy, as he had not lost previously-earned good time. Rather, he was only entitled to another hearing that comports with the minimal due process protections set forth in Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 94 S.Ct. 2963 (1974).

"While it is true that Knoll is not entitled to litigate the underlying facts of his prior disciplinary incidents," the appellate court explained, "the existence of those disciplinary incidents must be established to support the denial of good time premised on the prior incidents." See: In re PRP of Knoll, 2013 Wash. App. LEXIS 498 (Wash. Ct. App. 2013) (unpublished). ■

California County Not Liable for Misconduct of Jail Guard Not Acting within Scope of Employment

ON APRIL 3, 2013, THE CALIFORNIA Court of Appeal held that a county is not liable for damages arising out of the misconduct of one of its jail guards when such misconduct is deemed to be “purely personal” and thus not within the scope of the guard’s employment.

In February 2005, Paul and Felicia Perry were injured in a car accident involving a vehicle owned by Alejandro Vital, who was then employed as a veteran jail guard by Fresno County. After the Perrys filed a personal injury suit against Vital, he became obligated to pay their medical bills resulting from the accident because his insurance company refused to cover those expenses.

Vital then embarked on a scheme designed to intimidate the Perrys into dropping their lawsuit. He accessed information about “dangerous inmates” through the jail’s computer system, then sent them racially inflammatory and insulting letters in Paul Perry’s name using his return address, hoping they would provoke the prisoners to retaliate against the Perrys.

Vital also wrote an anonymous letter to Fresno High School officials, accusing Perry, a coach, of once molesting a basketball player at the school.

An investigation led to Vital’s eventual admission that he wrote the letters to the jail prisoners and to Fresno High School, as well as insulting letters to members of a street gang who, in response, said they would “do a drive-by” at the home of Paul Perry’s 70-year-old mother.

Vital was fired by the county and criminally charged with identity theft, extortion and attempting to dissuade a witness from testifying. He entered a no contest plea to three felony counts and was sentenced in November 2006 to one year in jail. In court, he explained his actions by saying, “I just lost my mind.”

The Perrys filed suit against Fresno County on the theory that under the doctrine of respondeat superior, an employer is liable for the torts of its employees when those torts are committed within the scope of their employment.

The trial court granted the county’s motion for summary judgment, finding that Vital’s actions were not within the scope of his duties as a jail guard.

The Court of Appeal affirmed, holding that although Vital’s position at the jail gave him access to the information he needed to carry out his scheme, the act of writing and mailing fraudulent letters was “purely personal” and not within the scope of his employment. Thus, the county could not be held vicariously liable for his actions. See: Perry v. County of Fresno, 215 Cal.App.4th 94, 155 Cal.Rptr.3d 219 (Cal. App. 5th Dist. 2013), rehearing denied, review denied. ¶

Texas Courts Examine Proof of Ability to Pay Probation Fees before Revocation

by Matt Clarke

IN A NOVEMBER 14, 2012 OPINION, THE Texas Court of Criminal Appeals held prosecutors are not required to prove that a probationer was able to pay fees and fines when his probation was revoked due to nonpayment. The Court of Appeals reversed the probation revocation on remand, and the Court of Criminal Appeals granted discretionary review of that ruling in June 2013.

Raimond Kevon Gipson, who was serving a term of probation, failed to pay his fees and fines. He was required to pay a $500 fine, supervision fees, court costs, a pre-sentence investigation (PSI) fee, a $50 Crime Stoppers fee and $1,000 in attorney fees. [See article in this issue of PLN regarding Texas criminal court fees].

The state filed for revocation due to the nonpayment. Gipson pleaded “true” to failure to pay fees but contested other reasons for the revocation. At no time did the state claim he was able to pay the fees but willfully failed to do so; Gipson also did not raise the issue of inability to pay. The trial court revoked his probation and sentenced him to eight years in prison.

On appeal, Gipson claimed that the state’s failure-to-pay statute, art. 42.12 § 21(c), Texas Code of Criminal Procedure, required the state to show that he was able to pay but willfully did not. He also claimed that Bearden v. Georgia, 461 U.S. 660 (1983) established a constitutional requirement that the state prove ability to pay before revoking his probation. The state maintained that by pleading true to the allegation, Gipson had waived any such claims.

Without addressing the state’s procedural arguments the Court of Appeals reversed the trial court’s order, holding that the failure-to-pay statute required the state to first prove ability to pay before revoking probation. The state petitioned the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals for discretionary review, which was granted.

The Court of Criminal Appeals held that the lower appellate court must first determine whether the alleged error had been preserved for review or waived by Gipson when he pleaded true to failure to pay fees. Because a plea of true normally waives any challenge to sufficiency of evidence of a probation revocation on appeal, this analysis must be performed within the framework of Marlin v. State, 851 S.W.2d 275 (Tex. Crim. App. 1993), in which the Court of Criminal Appeals held that “certain requirements and prohibitions are absolute and ... certain rights must be implemented unless expressly waived.”

Because it disagreed with the constitutional and statutory analysis of the appellate court, the Court of Criminal Appeals provided its own analysis.

The Court held that Bearden did not impose a duty on prosecutors to prove ability to pay; rather, it imposed a duty on the trial court to make an inquiry into ability to pay. The Court further held that the failure-to-pay statute did not cover two of the fees Gipson did not pay – the fees for Crime Stoppers and PSI. Therefore, if the Court of Appeals determines on remand that pleading true to failure to pay did not waive that issue for appellate review, it must decide whether Texas common law or the U.S. Constitution requires the prosecution to prove inability to pay prior to a probation revocation.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed and the case remanded to that court for further proceedings. See: Gipson v. State, 383 S.W.3d 152 (Tex. Crim. App. 2012).

Following remand, on March 13, 2013 the Court of Appeals again reversed the trial court's revocation of Gipson's probation. The appellate court found that "Generally, a defendant cannot challenge a revocation finding to which he pleaded 'true'; however, "[i]n this case, the record is devoid of evidence showing that Gipson's failure to pay attorney's fees, community supervision fees, or court costs, including PSI and Crime Stoppers fees, was willful."

Therefore, the Court of Appeals held the trial court had abused its discretion by revoking Gipson's probation, which affected his substantial rights by subjecting him "to a prison sentence rather than continued community supervision." With respect to Gipson's argument that the trial court violated his due process rights, the appellate court found he had failed to preserve that issue for review because he did not raise it before the trial court. See: Gipson v. State, 395 S.W.3d 910 (Tex. App. 2013).

On June 26, 2013, the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals granted the state's petition for discretionary review, and a decision remains pending. ■

Second Circuit: Videoconference at Resentencing Violates Right to be Present

THE SECOND CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS has held that resentencing a defendant by videoconference violated his right to be present in court, and the government failed to satisfy its burden of establishing that the defendant knowingly and voluntarily waived his right to be present. Under the circumstances, however, the error was not prejudicial.

On November 1, 2000, alleged al Qaeda member Mamdouh Mahmud Salim was confined at the Metropolitan Correctional Center (MCC) in New York, awaiting trial on federal terrorism charges.

Salim and his cellmate, a co-defendant in the terrorism case, plotted "to take a guard's keys so that Salim could attack his lawyers in an attorney-inmate meeting room. Their goal was to force Salim's attorneys to withdraw their representation so that District Judge Sand, who was presiding over the terrorism case and previously had denied Salim's repeated requests for new lawyers, would have to grant substitute counsel."

As Salim was escorted to his cell from a meeting with his lawyers, under the guise of retrieving additional legal materials, Salim and his cellmate assaulted MCC guard Louis Pepe, stabbing him in the left eye with a sharpened plastic comb. Before he could attack his attorneys, however, Salim was overpowered by other guards.

"Pepe was severely injured. He lost his left eye, incurred reduced vision in his right eye, and suffered brain damage that left his right side partially paralyzed and interfered with other normal functions, including his ability to speak and write."

On April 3, 2002, Salim pleaded guilty to conspiracy to murder and attempted murder of a federal official for the attack on Pepe. He was initially sentenced to 384 months in prison, which was later reversed on appeal. See: United States v. Salim, 549 F.3d 67 (2d Cir. 2008), cert. denied.

The district court imposed the same sentence on remand and Salim again appealed. This time, the Second Circuit agreed with the government that a terrorism enhancement was appropriate, and thus vacated the sentence and remanded.

On August 31, 2010, the district court held a second resentencing hearing which Salim attended by videoconference. The court imposed a life sentence as a terrorism enhancement, and Salim appealed a third time. Among other issues, he argued that he had not voluntarily waived his right to be present at the hearing, because the waiver "was premised on his fear of abuse by correctional officers" who, he alleged, had previously beaten and spit on him when he was moved to another prison.

The Court of Appeals recognized that Salim had a right to be present at a sentencing hearing under "both the Constitution and Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 43(a)(3)," which extended to resentencing. As a matter of first impression in that circuit, the appellate court held that the right to be present requires a defendant's physical presence and is not satisfied by appearing via videoconference.

The Second Circuit further found the district court had erred in determining that the government had satisfied its burden of proving that Salim knowingly and voluntarily waived his right to be present. The appellate court affirmed the district court's sentencing order, however, because "Salim has not explained why his absence might have altered his resentence, nor has he demonstrated that any error in his resentencing was so egregious as to warrant relief on plain error review." See: United States v. Salim, 690 F.3d 115 (2d Cir. 2012), cert. denied.

On January 9, 2014, Salim filed a motion to vacate under 28 U.S.C. 2255, which remains pending. ■

Eighth Circuit: Denial of Nominal Damages Jury Instruction was Improper

THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS held on September 4, 2012 that a district court erred when it refused to give a nominal damages jury instruction in a lawsuit brought by a Missouri state prisoner. Another trial was held in June 2013 following remand, and the jury again ruled in favor of the defendant prison officials.

Missouri Department of Corrections (DOC) policy allows a prisoner to declare his cellmate an “enemy” and be removed from the cell if he fears for his safety. The prisoner is then placed on a restraint bench until a compatible cellmate is found, a single-person cell becomes available or the prisoner elects to return to the original cell. While on the restraint bench, bathroom breaks and small amounts of water are allowed but food is not provided per DOC policy.

Arthur E. Taylor, Jr., was confined at the maximum-security Jefferson County Correctional Center when he declared his cellmate an enemy and was removed from the cell on September 9, 2005.

Taylor was shackled to a metal restraint bench, where he remained until he was placed in a cell with a new cellmate on September 11. He was unable to sleep during the two days he was shackled to the restraint bench in an upright position. Therefore, once in the new cell, he slept through breakfast and lunch.

Later that day, Taylor declared his new cellmate an enemy and was returned to the bench. This time he remained on the restraint bench until the evening of September 14, 2005.

Again, pursuant to policy, Taylor was not fed while on the bench. He first ate again on the morning of September 15, 2005 after missing about twelve meals.

Taylor filed suit in federal court, alleging that the failure of prison officials to provide him with food violated the Eighth Amendment. The case proceeded to trial and the district court gave Taylor’s requested excessive force jury instruction but refused to give his nominal damages instruction. The jury returned a verdict for the defendants, finding zero damages for Taylor.

The Eighth Circuit reversed, holding that “the district court abused its discretion in not submitting the requested nominal damages instruction to the jury.”

The appellate court rejected the defendants’ argument that the error was harmless, finding that “if the jury analyzed this element first and found no damages, it could not find excessive force.” As such, “the lack of a nominal damages instruction had a probable effect on this verdict.” Justice Kermit E. Bye issued a separate opinion that concurred in part and dissented in part. See: Taylor v. Dormire, 690 F.3d 898 (8th Cir. 2012).

Following remand, on May 14, 2013 the district court denied the defendants’ motion for summary judgment in part and granted it in part, and denied Taylor’s motion to amend his complaint to add a new defendant. See: Taylor v. Dormire, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 68062 (W.D. Mo. 2013).

The case went to another jury trial in June 2013, and the jury found in favor of the defendants on all counts. The district court denied Taylor’s motion for a new trial and he filed an appeal, which remains pending. The Missouri DOC has since revised its policy related to feeding prisoners while they are on a restraint bench. ■

Taylor County, Texas Rarely Disciplines Jailers

COMPARED TO SCANDALS AT THE HARRIS County Jail in Houston – where guards have assaulted and had sex with prisoners, mistakenly released prisoners and abandoned their posts to play dominos [see: PLN, Sept. 2013, p.23] – problems at the Taylor County Jail in Abilene, Texas seem fairly tame.

According to news reports, 28 of 135 employees at the Taylor County jail were disciplined in the three years prior to 2012, but the disciplinary action was minor and the misconduct much less serious than at Harris County. None of the discipline resulted in termination.

Former Taylor County Sheriff Les Bruce had a three-tier approach to employee discipline. First, an employee was given a letter of counseling. If that didn’t correct the problem, a letter of reprimand was issued. The last resort, termination, was reserved for when the letters did not have the desired effect of correcting errant behavior.

During the three-year period, two jail guards were reprimanded for “major booking errors.” One received a letter of counseling after he was caught surfing the Internet on the job after having received repeated prior warnings.

Other deputies were reprimanded for sleeping while on the job or in connection with the escape of two prisoners. One received a letter of counseling after five incidents of verbally abusing prisoners within nine months. Another employee was reprimanded for making “several medication errors on numerous times.”

One jailer didn’t check on a noise coming from a cell block which turned out to be a prisoner banging his head against the walls and doors, injuring himself enough to bleed from a head wound. The same guard was later disciplined again for yelling at prisoners in a cell block who were threatening to riot if the air conditioner wasn’t repaired, which allegedly caused the prisoners to become more aggressive.

Another jailer was reprimanded for releasing a prisoner a month early; the prisoner later turned himself in to complete his remaining sentence.

Repeated tardiness was also a problem among employees at the jail. Then-Sheriff Bruce noted that was a serious issue due to the need to maintain a mandatory guard-to-prisoner ratio at the facility.

“It’s very important to have those jailers there to receive briefing notes during shift changes,” he said. “They need to know what has been going on in that facility since they left.”

So long as misconduct by Taylor County jail employees mainly involves yelling at prisoners, surfing the Internet and being late for work, though, such transgressions pale in comparison to problems at other jails where guards have sexually abused prisoners or beaten and tasered them – sometimes to death. ■

D.C. Circuit Holds PLRA's Exhaustion Requirement Inapplicable to Former Prisoner

THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS FOR the District of Columbia has held that the administrative exhaustion requirement of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) does not apply to suits filed by persons who are no longer incarcerated.

The lawsuit at issue, filed by former prisoner John B. Lesesne, alleged permanent, life-threatening injuries suffered while in the custody of the District of Columbia (D.C.) Department of Corrections (DOC). Lesesne was involved in an altercation on March 30, 2008 in which he was shot in the lower abdomen, causing neurological damage to his leg.

He was arrested and transported to a hospital where he remained in the custody of the D.C. Metropolitan Police for the next 48 hours. He was then taken into DOC custody but remained cuffed by his wrist and ankle to the hospital bed.

As a result of the injury to his leg, doctors prescribed physical and occupational therapies and directed Lesesne to walk in the hospital hallway. However, even after the doctors faxed their recommendations to the DOC, guards did not let Lesesne walk in the hallway and restrained movement of his injured leg.

When he was discharged from the hospital on April 8, 2008, guards forced Lesesne to walk to the transport vehicle in full restraints; he fell when guards attempted to lift him into the vehicle. Shortly after his arrival at the D.C. Jail infirmary, Lesesne was re-hospitalized due to signs of distress resulting from the transport.

He was diagnosed with having suffered a pulmonary embolism and placed in intensive care; once again, his leg was restrained to the bed. Lesesne was released from the hospital on April 21. Over the next four days, jail personnel failed to provide his prescribed medications, change his bandages or clean his gunshot wound and surgical incision. The failure to supply this medical care resulted in the wound becoming infected.

Lesesne was released from jail on April 25, 2008. Two years later he filed a pro se civil rights complaint, arguing that the DOC's failure to treat his medical needs resulted in permanent, life-threatening injuries which require expensive therapeutic care, prescription drugs and constant pain management, as well as pain, suffering and emotional distress.

The district court granted the District of Columbia's motion for summary judgment on grounds that Lesesne had failed to exhaust administrative remedies at the D.C. Jail as required by the PLRA. The D.C. Court of Appeals joined its sister circuits in holding that the PLRA's exhaustion requirement did not apply to Lesesne because he was not confined when he filed his lawsuit, even though he had failed to make that argument before the district court. See: Lesesne v. Doe, 712 F.3d 584 (D.C. Cir. 2013). ■

Michigan Parole and Probation Supervision Scrutinized; Three Officials Fired

THE FAILURE TO PROPERLY SUPERVISE parolees and probationers accused of committing high-profile murders has resulted in the firing of three Michigan Department of Corrections (MDOC) employees. The MDOC supervises around 20,000 parolees and 50,000 probationers.

"Our parole/probation staff performs critical functions that are vital to ensuring public safety," MDOC director Daniel H. Heyns said in a written statement to the Detroit Free Press. "The overwhelming majority of these employees do excellent work and help to make our communities safer."

The burden on those employees has increased in recent years as the MDOC overhauled its parole system to release more prisoners as a result of budget reductions. The changes resulted in a decreased prison population, saving the MDOC millions of dollars and allowing it to close several facilities. [See: PLN, June 2010, p.13; April 2009, p.1].

However, three incidents led to scrutiny as to how the MDOC is supervising parolees and probationers. The first involved the robbery and brutal murder of Nancy Dailey, 80, in her Royal Oak home on November 20, 2011. She was discovered with her hands bound and her throat slit.

Alan Wood, 49, and Tonia Watson, 40, were charged with first-degree murder for killing Dailey; both were on parole, and a condition of their parole prohibited them from associating with each other. A Free Press investigation found that MDOC employees had failed to violate their parole despite knowing they were associating with each other and were suspected of committing new crimes.

The parole agent supervising Wood was fired and the agent supervising Watson received a 30-day suspension. UAW, the union that represents Michigan state employees, blamed the parole agents' supervisors. "It was management who cut Alan Wood free," said UAW representative Rick Michael, a veteran probation officer. "No agent can send a probationer or parolee back to prison without management approval. This agent went to her supervisors, and they're the ones who said 'Set him free.'"

Wood went to trial in January 2013.

He was found guilty of first-degree murder, felony murder, larceny in a building and illegal use of a financial transaction device. He received a mandatory life sentence the following month, telling the judge to "just get on with the sentencing and stop your preaching." Tonia Watson pleaded guilty, testified against Wood and was sentenced to 23 to 80 years in prison.

The second incident involving supervision errors by MDOC officials was the January 31, 2012 murder of 12-year-old Kadejah Davis-Talton, who was shot through the door of her home as the result of an argument over a cell phone. Joshua Brown, 19, was charged with her murder.

In September 2010, Brown had been placed on probation for drug and home invasion convictions. The judge ordered him to wear an electronic monitor but his probation agent never activated the device. Four months before Davis-Talton's murder, Brown was a suspect in an armed home invasion; his probation agent was aware of the incident and wrote a report to the judge, but it was unclear whether the report was ever sent or received.

Brown's probation agent and the agent's supervisor were later fired. Michael said the agent was working to get Brown a landline phone when Davis-Talton was shot. "First of all, they have to have a telephone; we can't hook them up without one, and he was working on it," Michael stated. "He is a very good agent, and his supervisor was aware of what was going on."

On January 7, 2014, almost two years after fatally shooting Davis-Talton and following an initial mistrial, Brown was sentenced to 24 to 50 years for second-degree murder, 14 to 30 years for assault with intent to murder to be served concurrently, and two years for using a firearm during a felony.

The third incident involving MDOC officials occurred after Tucker Cipriano, 19, was placed on probation following his February 2012 release from jail on drug charges. Cipriano and a friend attacked his adoptive family with a baseball bat on April 16, 2012, bludgeoning his father to death and leaving his mother and brother in critical condition.

An MDOC probation agent was placed on paid leave for losing track of Cipriano after he failed to show up for an April 5 meeting with the agent. A Free Press source said MDOC officials had trouble keeping up with Cipriano, who claimed he was homeless and staying in motels.

Cipriano pleaded no contest to felony murder and was sentenced in July 2013 to life without parole for killing his adoptive father. His co-defendant, Mitchell Young, also received a sentence of life without parole.

Michael said the blame for inadequate monitoring of parolees and probationers falls upon the MDOC and its management. "I believe that the union will be able to prove that there is a double standard in MDOC and that management is not capable of policing themselves," he stated. "There is a double standard – one for the agent and one for the manager – and when something goes wrong due to some shortcoming with MDOC, the agents are always blamed."

The MDOC, in turn, said it was taking action to increase supervision of parolees and probationers.

"The governor has made it clear that the level of violence in southeast Michigan, Flint and Saginaw is unacceptable. The Michigan Department of Corrections has a role to play in reducing that violence," said MDOC director Heyns. "I am putting measures in place that will improve supervision of parolees and probationers throughout Michigan. The restructuring of Ryan Correctional Facility to provide more custody beds for parole violators, aggressively going after absconders, embedding parole officers into police departments and auditing case loads are examples of some changes we are making that I believe will enhance public safety." ■

The Federal Tort Claims Act: A Primer

by Derek Gilna

THE FEDERAL TORT CLAIMS ACT (FTCA) is outlined in various sections of Chapter 28 of the United States Code, which describe the steps necessary to file and maintain a tort action against the U.S. government.

The FTCA is the exclusive remedy for monetary damages for injuries “caused by the negligent or wrongful act or omission of any employee of the government while acting within the scope of his office or employment, under circumstances where the United States, if a private person, would be liable to the claimant in accordance with the law of the place where the act or omission occurred.” 28 U.S.C. § 1346(b)(1).

This means that the FTCA is only available to address acts or omissions by federal employees that constitute torts under state law. Constitutional violations are not actionable under the FTCA unless they are also torts. For example, deliberate indifference to serious medical needs, which is a constitutional violation under the Eighth Amendment, may also constitute the torts of medical malpractice or negligence.

The FTCA constitutes a limited waiver of the United States’ sovereign immunity, allowing claimants to sue the federal government; however, the FTCA does not apply to acts by federal employees that are outside the scope of their employment.

FTCA suits should not be confused with § 1983 actions, commonly known as civil rights complaints, which apply to defendants acting under color of state – not federal – law. FTCA claims are also distinguishable from Bivens claims brought under Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents, 403 U.S. 388 (1971), which provides a private action for monetary damages against federal officials who commit constitutional violations.

Failure to follow the requirements for FTCA claims may lead to dismissal, with prejudice, at an early stage of the proceeding – thereby preventing any recovery even for serious personal injuries and financial losses.

The most significant hurdles to be cleared to prevent an early dismissal of an FTCA action include the exhaustion of administrative remedies and detailed notice requirements. The FTCA administrative process must be exhausted prior to filing an FTCA complaint, which is subject to dismissal on jurisdictional grounds if the claimant has failed to exhaust such remedies. See: Plyler v. United States, 900 F.2d 41 (4th Cir. 1990). Note that the administrative process, described below, is separate and distinct from the Bureau of Prisons’ grievance procedure, and that filing a grievance (i.e., a Form BP-9) does not satisfy FTCA administrative exhaustion requirements.

FTCA claims involve an administrative process in which notice is presented to a federal agency, then a separate complaint (lawsuit) is filed in federal court if the agency fails to resolve the claim administratively.

According to the FTCA, notices must be written and directed to the appropriate federal agency that the claimant asserts is responsible for wrongdoing. U.S.C. § 2675(a). The notice must provide the agency with sufficient information so it can carry out an investigation to ascertain its potential liability. The usual form of notice is Standard Form 95 (SF-95), but claimants are not required to use that form.

The written notice does not have to assert all elements of the cause of action (i.e., all of the legal requirements for stating a claim), but a claimant’s suit may be brought only on those facts and theories of liability raised in the administrative notice. See: Williams v. United States, 932 F.Supp. 357 (D.D.C. 1996). In other words, a claimant should err on the side of caution by including all facts and supporting information in the notice, to avoid possible dismissal of the complaint if the agency fails to settle the matter administratively. See: Bembenista v. United States, 866 F.2d 493 (D.C. Cir. 1989).

Claimants also must request a sum certain, and their potential for recovery will be limited to no more than the amount requested. 28 C.F.R. § 14.2(a). “Failure to have specified a sum certain at the administrative stage is a defect that deprives the court of subject matter jurisdiction over the action.” See: Ahmed v. United States, 30 F.2d 514 (4th Cir. 1994); Kokotis v. U.S. Postal Service, 223 F.3d 275 (4th Cir. 2000);

28 U.S.C. § 2675(b). A sum certain means a specified dollar amount.

Claimants under the FTCA must sign their notices or have them signed by their attorneys or legal representatives. If someone signs in their representative capacity, “evidence of the representative’s authority to sign ... must be shown.” 28 C.F.R. § 14.3(e); Kanar v. United States, 118 F.3d 527 (11th Cir. 1997). For example, if the representative has a prisoner’s power of attorney, a copy of the notarized power of attorney should be submitted with the notice. Failure to do so may result in dismissal of the claim, though some circuits are split on that issue.

The claimant must present written notice of the claim to the correct federal agency, such as on SF-95, and obtain proof that it was presented. 28 U.S.C. § 2675(a). Written notice is effective on the date it is received by the agency, not the date of mailing. 28 C.F.R. § 14.2(a). The claimant should attempt to ascertain the correct agency whose employees’ acts or omissions were the proximate cause of his injuries, and submit the notice to that agency. However, if the claimant inadvertently notices the wrong agency, the agency that received the notice “must transfer the claim forthwith to the appropriate agency and notify the claimant of the transfer.” 28 C.F.R. § 14.2(b)(1).

Further, the claimant bears the burden of presenting written notice of his claim prior to the expiration of the statute of limitations. FTCA claims will be barred if they are not presented in writing to the correct federal agency within two years of the accrual of the claimant’s cause of action. 28 U.S.C. § 2401(b).

After the presentation of notice of the claim, the claimant cannot file an FTCA complaint in federal court until the agency receiving the notice has had the claim for six months, and the federal court lacks subject matter jurisdiction until the six-month period has expired or the agency has issued a final denial of the claim. See: McNeil v. United States, 113 S.Ct. 1980 (1993). If the agency denies the claim, the claimant must file a complaint in federal court within six months of the date of the denial.

With respect to venue for filing FTCA complaints, the proper venue is the district where the claimant resides or where the act or omission occurred. 28 U.S.C. § 1402(b). The substantive law of the state in which the act or omission occurred is the controlling authority for FTCA claims, and the government's liability is "in the same manner and to the same extent as a private individual under like circumstances...." 28 U.S.C. § 1346(b), 28 U.S.C. § 2674. In some cases, state law presuit notice or expert report requirements may apply, such as in medical malpractice or negligence cases.

If state law does not permit recovery for certain types of tort claims, an FTCA complaint filed in that jurisdiction likewise will be barred from recovery. Further, South Carolina attorney Joe Griffith has noted that district courts are increasingly enforcing state-imposed damages caps in FTCA cases.

When filing an FTCA complaint, the complaint and summons are served on both the Attorney General in Washington, D.C. and the U.S. Attorney's Office for the district in which the lawsuit is filed.

FTCA trials are held before a district court judge, not a jury; relief may only take the form of monetary damages, and equitable relief is not available. Damages may not exceed the sum certain specified in the administrative claim unless "the increased amount is based upon newly discovered evidence not reasonably discoverable at the time of presenting the claim to the federal agency." See: 28 U.S.C. § 2675(b); Cole v. United States, 861 F.2d 1261 (11th Cir. 1988). Punitive damages and prejudgment interest are not allowable under the FTCA. 28 U.S.C. § 2674.

The United States – not federal departments, agencies or individual employees – is the only proper defendant in an FTCA claim. 28 U.S.C. § 2679. The alleged tortfeasor must be a federal employee acting within the course and scope of his or her federal employment, and must not be an independent contractor. 28 U.S.C. § 1346(b) (1), 2675, 2672, 2679 and 2671. Thus, for example, federal prisoners held at a facility operated by a private contractor, such as CCA or GEO Group, cannot file an FTCA claim against the company or its employees, as they are not federal employees.

The Supreme Court has held that a suit against the United States under the FTCA is the exclusive remedy for claims arising from medical treatment and related functions provided by Public Health Service (PHS) employees acting within the scope of their employment. See: Hui v. Castaneda, 559 U.S. 799 (2010) [PLN, Oct. 2010, p.44]. PHS employees provide medical care in some Bureau of Prisons and immigration detention facilities.

Further, compensation from the Federal Prison Industries Fund (18 U.S.C. § 4126) is the exclusive source of compensation available for an injury sustained by a prisoner in connection with work activities at a federal prison. See: Vander v. U.S. Dept. of Justice, 268 F.3d 661 (9th Cir. 2001).

FTCA claims concerning government policy decisions are barred by the discretionary function exception – i.e., acts or omissions of federal employees related to a "discretionary function or duty" – as are certain intentional torts. In general, only claims of negligence are covered by the FTCA rather than intentional misconduct. The discretionary function exception applies even when decisions are intentionally or negligently made, or the discretion is abused. See: United States v. Gaubert, 499 U.S. 315 (1991).

However, the intentional acts or omissions of an "investigative or law enforcement officer," including but not limited to assault, battery, false arrest, false imprisonment, abuse of process and malicious prosecution, are covered by the FTCA and may proceed. 28 U.S.C. § 2680(h); Millbrook v. United States, 133 S.Ct. 1441 (2013) (involving FTCA claims against Bureau of Prisons employees) [PLN, June 2013, p.28].

Lastly, attorneys are prohibited from receiving fees in FTCA cases that exceed 20% of an administrative settlement or 25% of a judgment or compromise settlement after a complaint is filed. 28 U.S.C. § 2678. ■

As the law is constantly changing, claimants who plan to file FTCA claims or complaints should research the most recent case law related to such actions. # Psst! Hey Man, Need Some Execution Drugs?

OFFICIALS IN DELAWARE AND 31 OTHER states that use lethal injection to execute prisoners are scrambling to find new drugs to carry out death sentences, and in some cases are procuring them through secret exchanges and confidential deals – and from questionable sources.

Emails obtained by the Associated Press (AP) revealed how the head of Delaware's Department of Correction enlisted a drugstore owner-turned-bureaucrat to acquire pentobarbital, the sedative component of the state's new three-drug execution protocol since production of sodium thiopental ceased in the U.S. in early 2011. [See: PLN, June 2011, p.1].

Delaware DOC Commissioner Carl Danberg reached out to Alan Levin, the state's economic development director, knowing that Levin used to own the Happy Harry's drugstore chain, which he sold in 2006 before becoming a state official. Aware that Levin had spent more than a decade cultivating connections in the pharmaceutical industry, Danberg asked him to make a few calls.

According to the emails obtained by the AP, in May 2011, Levin contacted Mike Kaufmann, CEO of the pharmaceutical division of Cardinal Health, one of the largest wholesale distributors of prescription drugs in the United States.

"While I know this is a bit of a political issue, since Cardinal is not located in Delaware, I believed it may be easier for Cardinal to do this," Levin wrote to Kaufmann. "Is [pentobarbital] something that Cardinal would be interested in selling to the state of Delaware? If not, do you have any recommendations who else we can pursue?"

Once Levin hooked up Danberg with his connection at Cardinal, "things fell into place," Danberg told the AP.

Officials said the drugs that Cardinal shipped to the Delaware DOC in June 2011 – including pentobarbital, pancuronium bromide and potassium chloride – were enough to last for several executions, beginning with Shannon Johnson, a convicted murderer who was put to death by lethal injection in April 2012.

Levin told the AP that he was "happy to help facilitate" the process of acquiring the drugs, but that he, Danberg and other state officials worked hard to conceal the process so as not to jeopardize the possibility of getting more drugs in the future.

"I did not want it getting outside the smallest number of people as possible how we were pursuing the chemicals because I wanted to make sure we had a supply of the chemicals first," Danberg said, candidly. "I did not want the supplier of the chemicals to go public, to be publicly known, simply because I did not want that source to dry up."

Executions in many states have been halted or postponed due to concerns that replacement execution drugs do not meet the constitutional prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment, as they may result in pain and suffering. In addition, death row prisoners and advocacy groups have filed a flurry of lawsuits stemming from states' efforts to find alternative sources for the drugs.

Some states have turned to compounding pharmacies to obtain execution drugs that are no longer available from manufacturers. Compounding pharmacies typically custom blend small amounts of specific drugs, but are not regulated by the federal government and the safety or effectiveness of the drugs is not verified by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration. A compounding pharmacy in Massachusetts was linked to an outbreak of fungal meningitis in October 2012 that resulted in over 60 deaths due to contaminated medication.

Three death row prisoners in Texas, the state with the highest number of executions, are challenging the state's plan to use a drug obtained from a compounding pharmacy.

"Use of compounded pentobarbital would constitute a significant change in the lethal injection protocol, a change that adds an unacceptable risk of pain, suffering and harm to the plaintiffs if and when they are executed," their lawsuit contends.

Medical experts note that compounded drugs carry a high risk of contamination and could subject prisoners to excruciating pain, which one expert compared to rubbing sandpaper on an open wound.

Further, a separate civil complaint filed in federal court in October 2013 alleges that officials with the Texas Department of Criminal Justice (TDCJ) submitted falsified prescriptions for pentobarbital to Woodlands Pharmacy, a compounding pharmacy in Houston, and used an individual employee's credit card to buy the drug instead of a state purchasing order.

Prison officials had previously tried to obtain pentobarbital using the name of the "Huntsville Unit Hospital," even though the Huntsville Unit, which houses the state's execution chamber, hasn't had a functional hospital for more than two decades.

"We believe that TDCJ's purchase of compounded pentobarbital from Woodlands Pharmacy violates numerous state laws," said Maurie Levin, one of the attorneys representing death row prisoners in the lawsuit. "The vast majority of compounded drugs can only be mixed or sold pursuant to a doctor's prescription. TDCJ did not get a prescription for its purchase of compounded drugs. There are exceptions to the requirement, but TDCJ's purchase does not qualify for any of them."

The pharmacy demanded that state officials return the pentobarbital, but they refused.

"The states are scrambling to find the drugs," noted Richard Dieter, who heads the Death Penalty Information Center. "They want to carry out these executions that they have scheduled, but they don't have the drugs and they're changing and trying new procedures never used before in the history of executions."

As a result, unpredictable things can happen with new, largely untested lethal injection drugs. One example was the October 15, 2013 execution of Florida prisoner William Hays, who was put to death for the 1986 rape and murder of 21-year-old Angela Crowley. Hays was injected with the sedative midazolam hydrochloride, the first-ever use of that drug to execute a prisoner in the United States. The drug, known commercially as Versed, was part of a three-drug protocol.

According to the Associated Press, Hays' execution lasted twice as long as it would have had pentobarbital been used; it took 16 minutes before Hays was declared dead, and he "remained conscious longer and made more body movements after losing consciousness than other people executed recently by lethal injection."

The execution prompted seven Florida death row prisoners to file a federal lawsuit challenging the "Midazolam Protocol" used by the Florida Department of Corrections.

"We don't even know if the new drug [midazolam] is working or not,” said Dieter. “Everything is a bit of an experiment with a human subject. If this were ordinary medicine, that would not be allowed, but this is the death penalty and that’s how it goes.”

As another example, when Michael Lee Wilson, 38, was executed in Oklahoma on January 9, 2014 by lethal injection, which included pentobarbital and a combination of other drugs, his final words were: “I feel my whole body burning.”

In Ohio, the planned November 2013 execution of Ronald Phillips was put on hold due to concerns about the use of a combination of midazolam and hydromorphone, a powerful painkiller.

“We really don’t know what the effect of using this drug cocktail will be, and that’s the really scary thing,” said Mike Brickner of the American Civil Liberties Union of Ohio. “What we are proposing is basically experimenting on human beings.”

This was the third time Ohio prison officials had changed their lethal injection drugs since 2009; previously, the state had used sodium thiopental and then pentobarbital when the former drug was no longer available.

“We don’t know how these drugs are going to react because they’ve never been used to kill someone,” said Fordham University law professor Deborah Denno, an expert on lethal injections. “It’s like when you wonder what you’re going to be eating tonight and you go home and root through your refrigerator to see what’s there. That’s what these departments of corrections are doing with these drugs.”

“You’re basically relying on the toxic side effects to kill people while guessing at what levels that occurs,” explained Professor Jonathan Groner at the Ohio State University College of Medicine. He said there are no guidelines for giving a lethal dose of hydromorphone because the drug is not designed to kill. An overdose could cause the prisoner to experience symptoms such as an extreme burning sensation, muscle pain or spasms, seizures, hallucination and vomiting, Groner said.

Ohio prisoner Dennis McGuire, 53, was executed on January 16, 2014 with an injection of midazolam and hydromorphone. According to news reports it took McGuire around 25 minutes to die; he struggled to breathe, tensed his body and made snorting sounds. His family has since filed a lawsuit in federal court over his prolonged death, while prison officials claimed that McGuire’s attorney coached him to fake that he was suffocating during the execution.

Hospira, Inc., the manufacturer that produces midazolam and hydromorphone, announced in February 2014 that it opposes using the drugs in lethal injections. “Hospira makes its products to enhance and save the lives of the patients we serve, and, therefore, we have always publicly objected to the use of any of our products in capital punishment,” the company stated. Ohio prison officials had obtained the drugs produced by Hospira from McKesson, a pharmaceutical distributor based in San Francisco.

Legal challenges have halted scheduled executions in several states, including California, Missouri, Georgia, North Carolina, Pennsylvania and Colorado.

In October 2013, Missouri announced that it would use pentobarbital obtained from a compounding pharmacy. That announcement followed the Missouri DOC’s decision to return vials of propofol it had planned to use for lethal injections to Morris & Dickson, the company that had supplied the drug. Morris & Dickson had sold the propofol to the DOC in violation of its agreement with the German manufacturer, Fresenius Kabi, which prohibits the drug’s use in executions.

At least one execution in Missouri was postponed pending the switch to pentobarbital, and in February 2014 a compounding pharmacy in Oklahoma, the Apothecary Shoppe, agreed to not sell the drug to the Missouri DOC. Previously, prison officials had paid the pharmacy $8,000 in cash for each dose of pentobarbital.

California abandoned plans to use a three-drug execution protocol in July 2013, and instead indicated it would use a single-drug method. The state has not had an execution since 2006, largely due to legal challenges to its lethal injection procedures.

Oklahoma prison officials reportedly used petty cash accounts to buy lethal injection drugs, including an account used to purchase bus tickets for released prisoners, in order to minimize the paper trail and avoid identifying the supplier of the drugs. Other states likewise have tried to prevent the disclosure of their sources for obtaining execution drugs.

“There is absolute chaos among the states,” said Professor Denno. “So, every few months it seems we see a different state using a different type of drug, or types of drugs.”

“Recent restrictions imposed by pharmaceutical companies and the Food and Drug Administration make procuring these drugs challenging. We must ensure that individuals facing the death penalty are afforded certain guaranteed rights of due process before a state proceeds with an execution,” stated Colorado Governor John Hickenlooper.

The Denmark-based drug manufacturer Lundbeck, which holds the sole license to produce pentobarbital for the United States, told prison officials as early as January 2011 that the drug was not intended for lethal injections and asked for its use in executions to cease.

Many states then turned to propofol instead, but the European Union, which opposes the death penalty, threatened to restrict shipments of the drug to the U.S. if it was used in executions. Propofol is a common anesthetic widely used by hospitals, and import restrictions would potentially impact patient health and safety.

“Our system is completely broken, and I don’t know how to say it more bluntly than that,” said Arkansas Attorney General Dustin McDaniell. “It’s a complete impossibility. I can no more flap my arms and fly across the state than I can carry out an execution.”

Some states have considered abandoning lethal injection and returning to more traditional forms of capital punishment. For example, a bill to permit firing squads was introduced in Wyoming, though the state senate voted on February 11, 2014 not to consider the legislation. A similar bill has been introduced in Missouri, while lawmakers in several other states, including Virginia, Louisiana and Tennessee, have proposed reinstating the use of the electric chair. ■

A Rare Look Inside the Maine State Prison's "Supermax"

An almost-clean version of hell

by Lance Tapley

THERE WAS A STAIN OF WHAT LOOKED like blood on the floor of the otherwise shiny-clean, empty Mental Health Unit isolation cell. "It's Kool-Aid," said my minder, a deputy warden. He smiled. But, as the saying goes, I hadn't drunk the Kool-Aid.

The cell faintly stank of shit. Mentally ill prisoners and those made mentally ill by prolonged solitary confinement are driven to cut themselves and to try to throw their feces at guards.

In one of the Administrative Segregation cellblocks – pure solitary confinement – I heard undulating cries and saw shadowy faces behind the steel doors' tiny windows.

The Maine State Prison "supermax," or Special Management Unit, is an ugly place. Are my photos ugly enough? Trying to fit form to content, I used an old film camera and grainy-image-producing 400-speed, black-and-white film shot usually without a flash under fluorescent lights. There were big limitations. I was not supposed to photograph prisoners, and my tour was rapid. That said, I was, possibly, the first journalist to visit and photograph the supermax – after eight years of writing about it.

Super-harsh supermax (super-maximum-security) prisons and their central feature of solitary confinement became a correctional craze 30 years ago. They became dumping grounds for the mentally ill and others who couldn't follow prison rules or who simply irritated guards. At least 80,000 human beings are held in them nationwide. Maine opened its supermax in the coastal town of Warren in 1992. Ten years later it built the new state prison around it.

The supermax's unforgiving conditions are not helpful, to put it mildly, in improving prisoner behavior. The evidence is overwhelming, in fact, that protracted solitary confinement damages or destroys prisoners' minds. Human rights groups consider it torture. And it costs taxpayers twice as much as "general population" incarceration.

Maine corrections commissioner Joseph Ponte has reduced the typical number of prisoners in isolation from close to 100 to 40 or so in a 900-man prison. Of the supermax's four cellblocks or "pods," two, of Administrative Segregation, have 50 cells each, and one is now empty. The Mental Health Unit, where solitary confinement has never been total, has two pods of 16 cells each, one for "acute" prisoners, one for "stabilization." Together they held 17 men the day I was there.

Stays in the supermax also are much shorter now, and there's a lot less prisoner "cutting up" and fewer brutal cell "extractions" by guards to tie prisoners into the restraint chair. For his reforms, Ponte has deservedly received national attention, helping fuel a still-weak movement to limit solitary confinement.

But the Maine supermax is still there, and it's still grim. While 40 prisoners may not sound like many, it's the total, according to one report, that England and Wales, with 56 million inhabitants, keep in isolation – isolation less severe than in American supermaxes.

And the supermax is part of a prison from which I receive constant reports of guard cruelty, inadequate medical care, understaffing, deliberate mixing of predators and the vulnerable, and – currently – turmoil because scores more men are being forced to double-bunk. Corrections says the double-bunking is being done for proper "classification" of prisoners. Critics suspect it's being done to save money.

It's hard to uncover the truth of what goes on in prisons. Prisoners are always unhappy, prisons are rumor mills and corrections officials are tight-lipped. But the reports I get are consistent.

I wasn't supposed to interview prisoners, but in the Mental Health Unit a short, meek-looking prisoner, James Brensinger, handed me a typed essay describing his incessant cutting up (he showed me deep scars on his arms), suicide attempts, hallucinations and the medical staff's failure to deal with his condition. It ends: "I am begging someone to please hear my pleas and cries."

In the other part of the unit, seven prisoners, some seemingly heavily doped, watched a TV high on a wall. I asked an alert young man how prisoners occupied themselves there. He silently pointed to the TV. Then, he remarked, referring to the cellblock: "Our mental health unit without mental health."

Here – to the supermax's Mental Health Unit – is where Republican Governor Paul LePage and the Democratic legislature recently decided to send violence-prone patients from the state's chief psychiatric hospital, Riverview, in Augusta. Unconvicted jail prisoners whom the courts have concluded should be examined for their sanity – people presumably innocent until proven guilty – will also be sent to this prison unit. Twenty more cells will be opened.

There's individual insanity, and there's social insanity. The writer Hannah Arendt famously coined the phrase "the banality of evil" to describe Nazi bureaucrat Adolf Eichmann, a "normal" man who sat at his desk and calmly signed papers that sent millions of Jews to their death.

The Maine State Prison's supermax, with its polished floors only a little stained with blood and, while I was there, with its tranquility only occasionally interrupted by a prisoner's muffled cries, is, to me, a physical manifestation of the banality of evil. "A clean version of hell," as a former prison warden described another supermax.

To be more compassionate toward its creators, however – to be less like those who defend this uniquely American form of mass torture – I should discard a word like "evil" and describe the supermax as a manifestation of social insanity, of a sick society.

"It's just crazy, this whole place," the young man in the Mental Health Unit told me. ■

Video Visitation a Growing Trend, but Concerns Remain

AGROWING TREND TOWARD THE USE of video visitation at jails across the country is drawing the praise of corrections officials and prisoners' family members alike, though some advocacy groups worry that video visits could pose an undue financial hardship on those least able to afford it and possibly lead to the elimination of in-person visits.

"I think it's the way of the future," said Kane County, Illinois police commander Corey Hunger. "In the next 20 years, I think everyone will have it."

At some jails, visitors can use video screens to communicate with prisoners in another part of the facility. Other systems allow people to conduct visits via the Internet from a remote location, including their own homes. Prisoners typically use video monitors set up in cell blocks or other designated areas; the visits are monitored and recorded. [See: PLN, July 2013, p.44; Sept. 2012, p.42; Nov. 2011, p.37; Jan. 2010, p.22].

But in Kane County and other jails, the installation of video systems spelled the end of in-person visits. Hunger said not having to screen visitors and escort them through the jail frees up guards to perform other duties. Officials also claim that doing away with face-to-face visits reduces confrontations among prisoners and the risk that visitors will smuggle in contraband.

"[F]rom the standpoint of safety and security, it's a huge improvement," stated St. Clair County, Illinois Sheriff Rick Watson. "Every pod has a video monitor and the prisoners don't have to be moved for visits, which saves on staff time. And if you cut down on movement of prisoners, you cut down on dangerous incidents."

Eliminating face-to-face visits worries some prisoner advocacy groups.

"It's a fundamental right to have meaningful visits with loved ones," said John Maki, executive director of the John Howard Association of Illinois, a Chicago-based organization. "If it's to supplement in-person visits, that's great. I think the danger in video visitation is using it to replace in-person visits," he added.

"I hate not being able to see him face-to-face when I come to the jail," stated Sherry McCullough, whose son is incarcerated at the St. Clair County Jail. "I want to get a good look at him, to tell him to stand up and turn around so I can see that he's getting enough to eat and that he hasn't been hurt. Instead, I have to see his cellmates marching around behind him in their underwear."

However, other family members have complained about problems with in-person visits, including long wait times, searches and non-contact visits conducted through a window using telephones.

"A lot of times you're trying to talk to your loved one and the phone on their end doesn't work," said Marilyn Murphy. "I don't like it. I like it when you can physically see them," she added. However, Murphy said visiting her son remotely through a home computer would be welcome. "To sit in the privacy of your home and visit a loved one?" she said. "Oh, yes."

Critics complain that video visits are sometimes used to financially exploit prisoners and their families, and that service providers often return a percentage of the video visitation fees to correctional facilities.

Paul Wright, director of the Human Rights Defense Center, the parent organization of Prison Legal News, described the practice as a kickback. "They're using this as another revenue stream from people who have the least ability to do anything about it," he said, comparing it to the "commission" model prevalent in the prison phone industry. [See: PLN, Dec. 2013, p.1]. He also noted that online video conferencing for non-prisoners, such as Skype, is usually free.

The largest provider of video visits, Securus, charges $1.00 per minute for the service. Securus CEO Richard Smith said the company anticipates adding another 100 video visitation sites by the end of 2014. According to the company's website, Securus already provides phone service to about 2,200 correctional facilities housing more than 850,000 prisoners in 45 states, as well as 81 video visitation systems.

Global Tel*Link, the nation's largest provider of phone services in prisons and jails, also offers video visitation – which is typically fee-based, with prisoners' families paying the cost of the visits.

For example, the Del Valle jail in Travis County, Texas ended in-person visitation in 2013 except for attorney visits. Instead, Securus installed a video system and charges a $20 fee for a 20-minute visit. The county gets a $4.60 cut from each fee.

At the Lake County, Illinois jail, a 30-minute video visit costs $25.95 and the county receives 20% of the revenue generated from visitation fees. The Shawnee County Jail in Kansas eliminated in-person visits in January 2014 and now charges $20 for a 20-minute video visit. Other jails that have recently adopted video visitation, charging fees that typically range from $.40 to $1.00 per minute, include those in Alachua County, Florida; Hamilton County, Tennessee; Cumberland County, New Jersey; Chippewa County, Wisconsin; and Maricopa County, Arizona.

While the cost of video visitation may seem steep, when prisoners' family members can visit over the Internet from their homes it eliminates the time and expense of traveling to the jail, plus allows them to accommodate work or school schedules.

The non-profit Prison Policy Initiative has urged the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) to regulate the fees for video visits in the same way it has regulated prison phone rates. The Massachusetts-based organization warned in a December 20, 2013 comment filed with the FCC that video visitation fees shared with corrections officials provide "perverse incentives" to eliminate in-person visits.

"The bottom line is that prison visits are a basic right that needs to be disconnected from a profit motive, both for private companies and the jails," stated John Maki.

Despite such concerns, video visitation has gained support from both jailers and prisoners' family members.

"I liked it because the privacy is better," said Karla Maldonado, who visits her brother at the Cook County jail. "Now you can hear what he's saying."

The Cook County jail complex eliminated in-person visits at a new building following the installation of a $1 million video visitation system, though face-to-face visits are still allowed in older units at the complex.

All 25 Illinois state prisons are scheduled to begin using video visitation this spring, officials said, with an estimated cost of $30 per visit. But Illinois Department of Corrections spokesman Tom Shaer stressed the state will not use the system, provided by Global Tel*Link, as a revenue source.

“Any money that comes to us will be applied to offset our costs,” he noted. “There is no profit motive for us. But we have so many families wishing to do this we may need more staff hours to make the service available.”

Shaer said the state also has no plans to eliminate in-person visits. “I can’t imagine the scenario in which someone would travel to a prison and then wish to communicate through a video screen rather than see a prisoner face-to-face,” he said. “All research shows in-person visits absolutely benefit the mental health of both parties; video can’t match that.”

Certainly, free or reasonably-priced video visitation offered in conjunction with in-person visits can benefit prisoners’ families who must travel long distances or otherwise have difficulty participating in face-to-face visits. But eliminating in-person visits and charging for video visitation is just another way to monetize the corrections system and financially exploit prisoners and their family members.

“With proper regulation and oversight, prison and jail video communication has the potential to offer additional avenues for critical family communication. But if left unregulated, this market could follow the trajectory of the infamously broken prison telephone industry, dominated by the same corporations,” warned Prison Policy Initiative executive director Peter Wagner. “In that market, companies compete not based on price or service, but rather on who can charge families the most and kick back the largest share of the revenue to the facility that awarded the monopoly contract.”

Online Gaming Accounts of New York Registered Sex Offenders Restricted or Closed

ACCORDING TO NEW YORK ATTORNEY General Eric T. Scheiderman, around 5,600 online gaming accounts belonging to sex offenders registered with the State of New York have been restricted or canceled. Gaming companies Microsoft, Sony, Blizzard, Electronic Arts, Warner Brothers, Disney, Funcom, THQ, Gaia Online, NCSOFT and Apple all cooperated in “Operation: Game Over,” resulting in the closure of sex offenders’ gaming accounts or revocation of their online communications privileges. The move was an initiative of the Entertainment Software Association.

New York requires registered sex offenders to list all of their email addresses, screen names and similar online identifiers in order to limit their access to certain websites such as Facebook. Scheiderman said sexual predators had been using the voice and text chat features in online games to identify and lure potential victims.

“The Internet is the crime scene of the 21st century, and we must ensure that online video game platforms do not become a digital playground for dangerous predators,” he said. “That means doing everything possible to block sex offenders from using gaming systems as a vehicle to prey on underage victims.”

As one example, Richard J. Kretovic, a 19-year-old resident of Monroe County, New York, pleaded guilty to sexually abusing a 12-year-old boy he met online on Xbox Live in 2011. He lured the boy to his house, where the abuse occurred. Kretovic was sentenced to a six-month jail term and 10 years’ probation in May 2012.

The logic of banning registered sex offenders from online gaming forums is hard to understand, though, as it does not affect unregistered offenders and will drive sexual predators to open accounts using pseudonyms and anonymous email addresses. Meanwhile, sex offenders who were not abusing their online gaming account privileges – including those whose offenses did not involve children – are being collectively punished by having their accounts restricted or canceled.

PLRA Does Not Permit Waiver of Court-ordered Answer

AN ILLINOIS FEDERAL DISTRICT COURT has condemned a practice employed by the Illinois Attorney General when representing defendants in lawsuits brought by prisoners. The district court concluded that a motion for leave to waive an answer is unnecessary, and that the assertion of affirmative defenses in a pleading purporting to be a “waiver” of the defendants’ obligation to file an answer is not permitted by statute or rule.

In the case at issue, the defendants’ motion for leave to waive an answer was filed in response to the court’s order that they answer the complaint. The motion relied upon the language of 42 U.S.C. § 1997e(g)(1). The district court noted that that provision of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) “allows defendants to conserve resources by waiving their right to reply to potentially frivolous or meritless claims.” It does not require the defendants to request a waiver to file an answer unless ordered to do so by the court upon a finding the claim has a reasonable chance of prevailing on the merits.

Once a district court orders an answer from the defendants they must comply, and the PLRA does not provide that their answer may deviate from the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Moreover, the PLRA states the court may not grant relief to a prisoner-plaintiff until the defendants file an answer, making the answer essential to the litigation.

The district court noted the defendants may generally deny the allegations in a complaint under Rule 8(b)(3), but may not respond by continuing to waive their answer “while simultaneously purporting to plead affirmative defenses.” The defendants’ motion, the court held, failed to comply with its order to answer the complaint.

The district court gave the defendants one week to file an answer and said failure to do so would result in their having “admitted the allegations of the amended complaint.” See: Boclair v. Hardy, U.S.D.C. (N.D. Ill.), Case No. 11-cv-05217; 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14278.

New Hampshire Prisoners Suspected of Breaching Prison Computer System

NEW HAMPSHIRE OFFICIALS ARE INVESTIGATING a suspected “breach” of the Department of Corrections (DOC) computer system at the State Prison for Men in Concord. The investigation began when a staff member noticed a cable linking a computer used by prisoners to a staff computer with access to the DOC’s data system.

“I’m told an inmate, or inmates, were able to hack into the CORIS system,” said Mark Jordan, a former president of the guards’ union. “Once they are in there, they could have access to parole dates, sentencing information, programming schedules for inmates, staff information. And they could change any of that. They could delete [detainer] information from other states.”

The Corrections Information System (CORIS) was installed in 2008 by Abilis New England. “CORIS connects relevant stakeholders through a single electronic offender record and centralized database, thereby providing a holistic view of the offender’s status, history, and risk profile,” a news release stated when CORIS was installed.

When the cable was noticed on August 24, 2012, the DOC called the State Police to assist in the investigation. “It’s a really complex investigation,” said DOC spokesman Jeffrey Lyons. “We don’t know whether any data was compromised. Maybe none was.”

Officials did not have many details about the breach. “We don’t know for certain when it occurred. We don’t know how long ago it may have occurred,” Lyons said. “We don’t know how it occurred.”

He added, “CORIS is password protected and only certain staff have the ability to add to or otherwise change the data that is maintained there. Most other data on the DOC network is password protected and anyone who attempted to access that would be blocked unless they had the appropriate password. Appropriate disciplinary action will be taken when all of the facts are gathered at the conclusion of the investigation.” The breach occurred in an area of the Correctional Industries program, which employs about 200 prisoners in a furniture-making shop, printing shop, license plate shop, woodworking shop and sign-making shop. Prisoner workers in the industries program use about two dozen computers in a closed network to track contracts and billing.

The investigation includes a forensic computer crimes investigator. According to DOC spokesman Lyons, contacted by PLN on March 4, 2014, “This is still an ongoing investigation that is being handled by the NH State Police Major Crimes Unit.” ■

Businesses, Members of Congress Not Happy with UNICOR

by Derek Gilna

WHEN A POWERFUL U.S. SENATOR takes interest in an issue, even a bureaucratic government agency like the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) pays attention.

Kurt Wilson, an executive with American Apparel, Inc., an Alabama company that makes military uniforms, and Michael Marsh of Kentucky-based Ashland Sales and Service Co., found that out after they learned that UNICOR, which runs prison industry programs for the BOP, was considering bidding on contracts for business that their companies already had. A public statement from U.S. Senator Mitch McConnell, who sits on the Senate Appropriations Committee, led UNICOR to change its mind.

Like many other initiatives of the federal government, UNICOR, formally known as Federal Prison Industries, Inc., started off as well-intentioned. Prisoners earning from $.23 to $1.15 an hour are trained to work in factories supervised by BOP staff, where in theory they learn job skills that will help them find employment following their release. However, UNICOR has become not only a job training program but a manufacturing behemoth that employs some 12,300 prisoners and made approximately $606 million in gross revenue in fiscal year 2012 – yet still reported a net loss of $28 million. [See: PLN, Nov. 2013, p.52].

With that kind of size, purchasing power and cheap prisoner labor, it is almost impossible for small businesses to compete. Indeed, several companies have lost federal contracts due to competition from UNICOR, resulting in job losses among freeworld workers. [See: PLN, Feb. 2013, p.42]. This has made some business owners nervous – and angry.

American Apparel has to compete head-to-head with UNICOR on almost all of its contracts with the federal government, and the company said unfair competition from low-paid prisoner labor forced it to close a plant in May 2012 and lay off 175 workers. “We pay employees $9 on average,” Wilson stated. “They get full medical insurance, 401(k) plans and paid vacation. Yet we’re competing against a federal program that doesn’t pay any of that.”

Ashland Sales and Service Co. has been making windbreakers for the U.S. Air Force for 14 years, according to Marsh, and competition from UNICOR is endangering 100 jobs at the company, which is the largest employer in Olive Hill, Kentucky. “That’s 100 people buying groceries. We use trucking companies in the town; buy parts and light bulbs there every day. That’s all lost when prisons take away contracts.”

UNICOR has 81 factories in BOP facilities around the country and does far more than supply products and services for prisons and prisoners’ needs. It manufactures goods in six industry categories – clothing and textiles, electronics, fleet and industrial products, office furniture, recycling, and data entry and other services – with clothing being its mainstay.

In the past, legislation gave UNICOR an advantage in obtaining various federal contracts, but the law was amended by Congress from 2002 to 2005, and again through Section 827 of the National Defense Authorization Act of 2008, to limit that preferential advantage.

Kurt Courtney, director of governmental relations at the American Apparel and Footwear Association, said UNICOR is “a federal program [that is] tanking our industry.... The only way for workers to get jobs back is to go to prison. There’s got to be a better way to do this.”

U.S. Representative Bill Huizenga sponsored a bill in 2011 to do just that – HR 3634, the Prison Industries Competition in Contracting Act. “This is a threat to not just established industries; it’s a threat to emerging industries,” Rep. Huizenga stated at the time. “We know that in the [economic] recovery, many new jobs are coming out of small businesses, and it makes no sense to strangle them in the cradle.”

Manufacturing in America has changed over the decades but UNICOR does not use state-of-the-art manufacturing techniques because it has no need or motivation to do so – even though this means prisoners employed in UNICOR programs don’t receive modern job training that will help them obtain post-release employment.

As for quality, when UNICOR steps outside of its comfort zone and attempts to compete in areas other than prisoner goods and services, it sometimes falls flat. Even though it landed a federal contract to supply helmets for the U.S. military based upon a preferential bidding process, 44,000 of the helmets were recalled in 2010 due to quality issues. UNICOR then won a no-bid contract the following year to produce body armor to be supplied to Pakistan’s military. [See: PLN, Sept. 2011, p.46; Jan. 2011, p.20].

Although the BOP has cited statistics claiming that UNICOR workers have lower recidivism rates, such data has been questioned. In 2013, the Congressional Research Service noted that “... questions about the methodology used in most evaluations of correctional industries means that there is no definitive conclusion about the ability of correctional industries to reduce recidivism.”

John Palatiello, president of the Business Coalition for Fair Competition, said his organization comprised of businesses and taxpayer groups is sympathetic to the BOP’s goals of providing job training to prisoners and reducing recidivism, but that such goals should not be accomplished at the expense of small businesses and their employees who face unfair competition from UNICOR.

HR 3634 failed to pass and was reintroduced on May 22, 2013 as HR 2098, which has 15 cosponsors and is currently pending in committee. Among other provisions, the legislation would require UNICOR to compete for its contracts, “minimizing its unfair competition with private sector firms and their non-inmate workers and empowering Federal agencies to get the best value for taxpayers’ dollars.”

HR 2098 would further require UNICOR’s board of directors to, “not later than September 30, 2014, increase the maximum wage rate for inmates performing work for or through Federal Prison Industries to an amount equal to 50 percent of the minimum wage,” and “not later than September 30, 2019, increase such maximum wage rate to an amount equal to such minimum wage.” However, the bill also provides that up to 80% of prisoners’ gross wages may be deducted for taxes, fines, restitution, family support, a savings fund or other purposes. ■

Ninth Circuit Holds Staff Sexual Abuse Presumed Coercive; State Bears Burden of Rebutting Presumption

THE NINTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS has held that a district court erred when finding a prisoner could not state an Eighth Amendment sex abuse claim because he “consented” to a relationship with a prison guard.

In 2002, Idaho prisoner Lance Wood and guard Sandra De Martin began a romantic, but not sexual, relationship. Within a few months, however, Wood heard “rumors that Martin had gotten married.” She denied being married but Wood said he wanted to end the relationship.

Shortly thereafter, Martin entered Wood’s cell and “cupped her hand on [his] groin ... enough to excite [him].” Wood pushed her away and said “you need to back off on this.”

Wood again tried to end the relationship but Martin pursued him and subjected him to “aggressive pat searches” on several occasions. Wood went so far as to ask another guard for help, but Martin continued to pursue him.

After Wood ended the relationship, Martin again entered his cell and “grabbed ahold of [his] penis and started to stroke it.”

Martin continued to harass Wood after that incident, but he did not initially report her due to fear of retaliation. Eventually he did report Martin and was transferred to a different prison the next day.

Wood then filed suit in federal court, alleging sexual harassment, retaliation and failure to protect claims. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendant prison officials on Wood’s retaliation claim and his claims that Martin had entered his cell, cupped his groin and stroked his penis.

The district court relied on Ault v. Freitas, 109 F.3d 1335 (8th Cir. 1997) to hold that “welcome and voluntary sexual interactions, no matter how inappropriate, cannot as a matter of law constitute ‘pain’ as contemplated by the Eighth Amendment.” Under that standard, the court concluded that Wood could not establish an Eighth Amendment violation.

The Ninth Circuit disagreed, first recognizing the indisputable proposition that a guard’s sexual harassment or abuse of a prisoner violates the Eighth Amendment.

Noting that whether a prisoner can consent to a relationship with a guard was a matter of first impression, the appellate court observed that “because of the enormous power imbalance between prisoners and prison guards, labeling a prisoner’s decision to engage in sexual conduct in prison as ‘consent’ is a dubious proposition.”

The Court of Appeals declined to follow Ault because it “utterly failed to recognize the factors which make it inherently difficult to discern consent from coercion in the prison environment.”

While the Ninth Circuit was “concerned about the implications of removing consent as a defense for Eighth Amendment claims,” it found that “allowing consent as a defense may permit courts to ignore the power dynamics between a prisoner and a guard and to characterize the relationship as consensual when coercion is clearly involved.”

Ultimately, the Court of Appeals adopted a bright-line rule which establishes a presumption that alleged sexual misconduct by prison staff is not consensual. While declining to exhaustively define coercive factors, the Court noted that obvious factors include “explicit assertions or manifestations of non-consent” and “favors, privileges, or any type of exchange for sex.”

The appellate court held that the state bears the burden of rebutting “this presumption by showing that the conduct involved no coercive factors.... Unless the state carries its burden, the prisoner is deemed to have established the fact of non-consent.”

Applying this rule, the Ninth Circuit held Wood had established non-consent for purposes of surviving summary judgment, because his “objective conduct demonstrates non-consent and the state cannot overcome its burden.” See: Wood v. Beauclair, 692 F.3d 1041 (9th Cir. 2012).

Following remand, a jury trial was held in December 2012, resulting in a mistrial. On April 8, 2013 the district court denied Wood’s motion to hold the defendants in contempt for “allegedly recording his attorney phone calls, monitoring his attorney visits, and opening and reviewing his legal mail,” finding they had legitimate security reasons for doing so. The court also denied his motion for a protective order and for appointment of counsel. See: Wood v. Martin, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 52305 (D. Idaho 2013). ■

Lawsuits filed over Oregon Jail Death

THE MOTHER OF A DECEASED PRISONER has sued jail and hospital officials over the death of her son at the Marion County Jail (MCJ) in Salem, Oregon.

On June 14, 2010, Robert Haws was arrested for several criminal offenses and a probation violation, according to court records. He was held at the MCJ pending trial.

A month later, Haws was playing basketball with other prisoners at 9:30 a.m. During an argument, fellow prisoner Robert Dailey punched Haws in the jaw, knocking him unconscious and causing his head to hit the concrete floor. Dailey and the other prisoners fled.

Guards did not witness the altercation or see Haws lying unconscious on the basketball court. Approximately fifteen minutes later, Dailey and a few other prisoners returned to check on him.

They dragged Haws to the edge of the court and propped him up. He was barely conscious, vomiting and urinating on himself and bleeding from the nose. Unbeknownst to guards, one prisoner made several trips to the laundry room to replace Haws’ bloody clothing.

Guards did not notice Haws on the video monitor until 10:40 a.m. When they finally responded, he was disoriented, unresponsive and exhibiting signs of delusion, according to a federal lawsuit filed by his mother, Diane Bernard. See: Bernard v. Myers, U.S.D.C. (D. Ore.), Case No. 11-cv-00608-HZ.

Haws was handcuffed and taken to segregation by wheelchair. Guards later placed him in leg restraints, even as he continued to vomit and bleed from his mouth and nose. Jail officials finally called 911 sometime after 11:15 a.m., and paramedics arrived fifteen minutes later.

“Security officers and medical staff present said that Haws probably had a seizure and conducted no medical exam for evidence of trauma or other causes,” the suit alleged.

A jail nurse told paramedics that Haws may have suffered a seizure, and a guard who rode in the ambulance falsely informed paramedics that Haws had been suicidal two days prior to the incident and “had lots of access to over-the-counter drugs.” His medical history and symptoms did not support those claims, and the possibility of head trauma was never discussed.

Haws finally reached the emergency room at Salem Health about 12:00 p.m. but his condition was not classified as a true emergency. Doctors treated Haws “as if he were an overdose patient despite the rather ample evidence of head trauma,” according to court records.

In a separate state court suit, Bernard alleged that hospital employees were negligent in diagnosing and treating her son. She claimed, for example, that Haws remained chained to a gurney, without a head scan, from noon until evening.

“A critical factor in overall outcome from acute subdural hematoma is the timing of operative intervention,” the lawsuit stated. “Those operated on within four hours of injury may have mortality rates as low as 30 percent. Those operated on after four hours of sustaining the injury have mortality rates around 90 percent.”

“The hospital allowed him to languish for about nine hours in the ER,” said Michelle Burrows, a longtime prisoners’ rights attorney who represents Bernard. “That is somewhat inexplicable by the hospital.”

When an X-ray was finally performed at about 7:00 p.m., it revealed that Haws had a subdural hematoma. He was rushed into emergency brain surgery but emerged five hours later in a coma; he remained on life support for four days and died a week after the surgery.

“Defendants failed to adequately evaluate and diagnose [Haws] by assuming facts not present and treating [him with] less than the standard of care, because [he] was an inmate,” the suit filed by his mother alleged.

When Haws was admitted, hospital staff misidentified him as having come from the Oregon State Penitentiary, according to court documents. While such a mistake may seem innocuous, the evidence suggested that the lack of adequate care provided to Haws was the result of prisoner bias and mistreatment by hospital staff. A jail nurse admitted during her deposition testimony that she had debated sending Haws to a different hospital because she had “so many long-term concerns with Salem Health and the way they treat prisoners.”

Bernard is suing the hospital and its staff for medical malpractice, wrongful death and civil rights violations for the delay in providing adequate medical care. She said she filed separate actions because she did not want to sue the Marion County Sheriff’s Office in Marion County Circuit Court, and wasn’t sure if a suit against the hospital and staff could be brought in federal court.

A jury trial has been requested in both cases. Unsurprisingly, both hospital spokesman Mark Glyzewski and sheriff’s office spokesman Don Thomson declined to comment, citing the pending litigation.

The case in federal court was remanded to the Marion County Circuit Court in May 2013, where it remains pending with a status hearing scheduled for June 3, 2014. See: Bernard v. Salem Health, Marion County Circuit Court (OR), Case No. 12C18741.

Robert Dailey ultimately pleaded guilty to criminally negligent homicide for causing Haws’ death, and was sentenced to five years in prison. ■

News in Brief

Arizona: Two prisoners at the Yavapai County Jail have been sentenced for their involvement in a fraudulent tax refund scheme. James Borboa pleaded guilty and on September 8, 2013 received an additional term of 18.5 years in prison for using other prisoners' IDs to file tax returns for 2010, 2011 and 2012. Justin Eugene Shaw Young, who also participated in the scheme, pleaded guilty in August 2013 and received a mitigated sentence of 6 years. Borboa and Young offered kickbacks of about $1,000 to each prisoner whose ID was used in the tax scam.

California: On August 23, 2013, Robert Eugene Vasquez, 36, was sentenced to life in prison without the possibility of parole for the stabbing death of his neighbor, Bobby Ray Rainwater, Jr. Vasquez had been told by his mother that Rainwater was a child molester, though actually he had been required to register as a sex offender for an offense that did not involve a child. Vasquez attacked Rainwater in their mobile home park, punched him in the back of the head and then stabbed him until he was nearly decapitated.

California: A veteran prison guard at the California Men's Colony was sentenced to 30 days in jail in August 2013 for accepting bribes. Kevin Jon Venema, 50, was confronted by internal affairs officers who accused him of selling tobacco and cell phones to prisoners. Venema, initially charged with three felonies, pleaded no contest to one count of accepting a bribe as a correctional officer. His sentence included three years of probation in addition to the jail term.

California: Santa Barbara County jail guards Robert Kirsch and Christopher Johnson pleaded not guilty on August 30, 2013 to charges of assaulting a prisoner. They were released on their own recognizance and had no comment after their arraignment. "Our agency does not tolerate the unnecessary or excessive use of force. I am saddened by these allegations," Sheriff Bill Brown said in a statement.

Colorado: In a 400-page report, the Colorado Bureau of Investigation concluded that wrongdoing by jail officials was not responsible for the in-custody death of Zackary Dean Moffitt, 33, who suffered a cardiac arrest during a confrontation with deputies at the Summit County Jail. As a result of the report, the 5th Judicial District Attorney's Office issued a declination letter on August 26, 2013, confirming that they would not pursue criminal charges related to Moffitt's death.

Florida: A Pasco County Jail nurse's assistant was fired and arrested on August 27, 2013 after she used her agency laptop to hack into the email accounts of Sheriff Chris Nocco and other top jail staff. Diedre Devonne Fitzgerald, 24, was released on $15,000 bail after she admitted to unlocking passwords and using the hacked accounts to obtain confidential material. She had worked at the jail for almost two years.

Georgia: On September 9, 2013, Georgia state prisoner Jesse Barrett Mainor was charged with impersonating a police officer in connection with a telephone scam. Mainor had made phone calls to at least nine Alabama residents, claimed they had outstanding warrants and attempted to get them to send him money on Green Dot MoneyPak cards. A grand jury will decide whether Mainor, who also has outstanding charges in Florida, will face trial on eight other charges related to the phone scam.

Georgia: At a hearing in Bibb County Superior Court on August 26, 2013, former jail guard Nazon Eo'ne Johnson, 22, was sentenced to four years' probation for bringing alcohol into Central State Prison and violating his oath of office. Another guard, Paris Dewayne Watson, who pleaded guilty to the same charges, admitted the alcohol was for consumption while on duty. Both guards were sentenced as first-time offenders, and must surrender their Peace Officer Standards and Training certification and pay fines and attorney fees in addition to their terms of probation.

Illinois: Kenneth Conley, who escaped from the Metropolitan Correctional Center in December 2012 while facing federal bank robbery charges, was sentenced to a prison term of 41 months on February 24, 2014. Conley, 40, and fellow prisoner Joseph Banks had used bed sheets and dental floss to rappel 17 stories from a window at the high-rise jail; they then escaped in a cab. Banks was caught two days later while Conley remained on the run for 18 days. At his sentencing hearing, while the judge was explaining the 41-month sentence for the escape charge, Conley told him, "You can take your analogy and shove it right up your ass."

India: On September 2, 2013, Jai Shankar, also known as "Psycho Killer Shankar," a convicted murderer and rapist, escaped from the high-security Parappana Agrahara jail with the help of a duplicate key and a bed sheet, which he used to climb down a wall. Shankar also allegedly scaled two 15-foot walls and wore a police uniform when he absconded. Eleven jail employees were suspended in connection with the escape.

Indiana: Michael Snow, a shift supervisor at the Marion County Jail, was bitten by prisoner Deondre Langston on August 22, 2013. Guards were trying to transfer Langston to the medical unit for a psychological evaluation when he resisted and charged at Snow with his head down. He then wrapped his arms around Snow's legs and bit him on the thigh. Snow was treated for the bite wound, which broke the skin and caused bruising; he plans to file charges against Langston.

Indiana: On July 30, 2013, Marcus Crenshaw, a guard at the Indiana State Prison, was caught bringing three-quarters of a pound of marijuana into the facility. He was suspended without pay and charged with trafficking with an offender, a Class C felony. Crenshaw was stopped and searched at the start of his shift and found to be in possession of approximately 343 grams of marijuana that DOC officials said was Indiana: Two unnamed Indiana State Prison guards were hospitalized following an August 22, 2013 incident in which they were stabbed by prisoner Terrance Swann. One was injured so severely that he had to be airlifted to Wishard Memorial Hospital in Indianapolis; the other guard was treated at a Michigan City hospital and returned to work later that same day. The prison was placed on lockdown after the attacks and Swann was transferred to the Westville Correctional Facility.

Kentucky: A contract food service worker was charged with rape and promoting contraband at the Henderson County Detention Center on September 11, 2013. Brittany L. Murch, 26, was jailed on two felony counts of third-degree rape and two felony counts of first-degree promoting contraband. State police said Murch had sex with a prisoner and brought him methamphetamine and alcohol. She pleaded guilty to the charges and was sentenced on February 25, 2014 to concurrent terms of 12 months on each count of rape and three years on each contraband charge.

Louisiana: As a result of a joint investigation involving the Louisiana State Police and Lincoln Parish Sheriff's Office, prison guard Danny Henshaw was charged with using excessive force against a prisoner during a disturbance at the Lincoln Parish Detention Center. Henshaw resigned from the Sheriff's Office and turned himself in on August 22, 2013. The prisoner was examined by medical staff at the facility but did not report any injuries as a result of the incident.

Maryland: Prince George's County deputy sheriff Lamar McIntyre pleaded guilty on August 15, 2013 to two counts of sexual misconduct. He was initially charged with rape, but the charges were reduced after the female prisoner he had been accused of assaulting told investigators the sex was consensual. A $15 million lawsuit was filed against the former deputy by the 34-year-old prisoner, who said the incident occurred inside a holding cell while she awaited a court hearing.

Mexico: A prison in the Mexican town of Nuevo Laredo, across the border from Laredo, Texas, was the site of yet more violence in Mexico's overcrowded prison system. On August 29, 2013, eight prisoners were murdered with homemade knives after being transferred to the facility; it was unclear whether the killings were gang-related. In October 2013, PLN reported a violent disturbance at a prison in the central Mexican state of San Luis Potosi that left 11 prisoners dead and more than 65 injured.

Michigan: Derreck White, also known as Abraham Pearson, attacked Deputy Harrison Tolliver in a holding cell near a Detroit courtroom on September 9, 2013. Using a sharpened comb to stab the guard three times in the neck, White handcuffed Tolliver and left the courthouse wearing his uniform; he then carjacked a minivan and escaped. White was captured later the same night while walking along I-94. Harrison was treated at a local hospital and released.

Mississippi: Tyler Smith, 20, beat fellow prisoner Clifton Majors, 35, to death at the Central Mississippi Correctional Facility on September 1, 2013, because he feared that Majors and other prisoners planned to harm him. MDOC Commissioner Christopher Epps said "breaches in security" in the maximum-security area of the prison allowed the deadly assault to occur. Investigators said there was no indication Smith had used a weapon in the attack.

Mississippi: As many as 90 prisoners were released from their cells on August 24, 2013 after an altercation between a guard and a prisoner resulted in the prisoner gaining control of the keys to many of the pods in C Building at the Lauderdale County Jail. Sheriff Billy Sollie said six prisoners were charged with arson, escape, simple assault and aiding escape in connection with the disturbance. Surveillance video helped investigators identify the prisoners involved in the incident.

Nevada: There's the Mile High Club, then there's the 2.9 Mile Drive Club. That's the distance between the Clark County Detention Center (CCDC) and the city jail, which provided prisoners Carlisa Brookins and Alexis Garcia enough time to engage in oral sex while they were being transported in a jail van on August 8, 2013. After the tryst was discovered, Brookins and Garcia were returned to the CCDC where they were charged with voluntary sex with an inmate. Brookins said she performed the act to "make the guys in the back of the bus jealous."

guilty on January 7, 2014 to felony battery charges stemming from an incident at the Clark County Detention Center. Law walked into the jail with an aluminum baseball bat in September 2013 and proceeded to attack jail guard Darren McCray, who was the first officer he encountered. Law told detectives he was seeking revenge against the police for failing to conduct a proper investigation after he was robbed. He was sentenced to 3–10 years on March 3, 2014.

New Hampshire: On September 4, 2013, the New Hampshire Executive Council rejected a pardon request from Thomas Schoolcraft, a former Cheshire County jail guard who was convicted in 2004 for a series of home burglaries. The Council voted 3-2 to deny the pardon, with Councilmember Christopher Sununu stating that Schoolcraft's crimes were still "fresh in the minds" of his victims. Schoolcraft is currently pursuing a master's degree in criminology and had hoped a pardon would allow him to resume working in law enforcement.

New York: While incarcerated at the St. Lawrence County Correctional Facility, Joshua Henderson entered another prisoner's cell, pushed him down and allegedly reached into the victim's pants and grabbed his genitals. Henderson, 24, was charged with forcible touching and second-degree harassment in connection with the August 30, 2013 incident.

New York: On August 25, 2013, Robert Smalls, an off-duty prison guard, shot his 17-year-old son. There were conflicting accounts regarding what happened. Smalls told investigators he thought there was an intruder and felt he was in immediate danger; his son, Quasaun, told police the two had been arguing. Quasaun fled the hospital before being treated for the gunshot wound, and his father was charged with felony assault and criminal possession of a weapon.

North Dakota: New Castle Correctional Facility prisoner Michael Howard Hunter mailed a threatening letter to federal judge Rodney Webb on December 12, 2012. He was charged with sending the letter even though Judge Webb had died more than three years earlier, and pleaded guilty on September 2, 2013. He faces up to 10 years in federal prison.

Ohio: On August 16, 2013, federal prosecutors filed charges against Marlon Taylor, a former guard at the Lorain County Jail, for repeatedly striking a prisoner and causing him bodily injury. The Lorain County Sheriff's Office had previously released surveillance video of the incident. [See: PLN, Jan. 2013, p.50]. Taylor was charged with one count of deprivation of rights under color of law.

Ohio: Death row prisoner Billy Slagle's August 4, 2013 suicide was accomplished with an "item of permissible property," according to Department of Rehabilitation and Correction spokeswoman JoEllen Smith. Slagle killed himself hours before he was scheduled to be placed on 24-hour suicide watch in advance of his execution for the 1988 stabbing death of Mari Anne Pope during a burglary. Officials at the Chillicothe Correctional Institution would not say what the item was and did not provide details regarding the manner of Slagle's death.

Ohio: According to Richland County Assistant Prosecutor Brent Robinson, on August 12, 2013, Robert A. Picklesimer, 54, a food service supervisor at the Mansfield Correctional Institution, was indicted on one count of sexual battery, one count of theft in office and two counts of bribery. Oklahoma: Prison officials said Donald Lee Grayson, 61, gained access to a laptop from his prison cell and filed false tax returns using the names and bank accounts of fellow prisoners. In August 2013, Grayson received concurrent sentences of 18 months for each of three counts of filing false returns, and will be required to pay restitution. A guard discovered the scheme after noticing a power cord in Grayson’s cell. Investigators said he received fraudulent tax refunds in the amount of $14,226.

Oklahoma: A lawsuit filed on August 13, 2013 claims that prisoner Philip Thomas Burris, Jr. was forced to have sex with female prison employee Kasey McDonald “50 to 100” times at the Joseph Harp Correctional Center. McDonald was arrested and charged with engaging in sexual misconduct – the fifth such case involving a Joseph Harp employee since 2008. The lawsuit also alleges that Burris’ former case manager supplied him with cell phones and marijuana. “These things happen,” said Corrections Department spokesman Jerry Massie.

Oklahoma: Mark Gregory Valadez faces additional charges after he was booked into the Oklahoma County jail on September 1, 2013 with a loaded derringer concealed in his rectum. He managed to avoid a metal detector and was only caught after bragging to other prisoners about smuggling the weapon into the facility. Valadez was hospitalized to have the pistol removed and now faces felony charges of possession of contraband in a penal institution.

Pennsylvania: On September 12, 2013, a jury acquitted former veteran federal prison guard Lamont Lucas of having sex with a female prisoner after the defense argued that the prisoner was a habitual liar. [See: PLN, Sept. 2013, p.17]. The jury rejected the prisoner’s story and was presented with powerful character evidence in support of Lucas. An attorney for the defense said Lucas, who had been suspended without pay following the accusations, was unlikely to return to his job with the Bureau of Prisons.

Tennessee: A dietitian at the Unicoi County Jail was arrested on September 6, 2013 and charged with introducing drugs into a penal facility. Faith A. Smith allegedly met with a prisoner’s family member who provided the drugs that she brought into the jail.

Texas: Justin P. MacDonald, 29, was in the Dallas County Jail on a probation violation and just wanted some fresh air. He walked out the front doors of the facility while taking out the trash on July 26, 2013, which prompted a lockdown. MacDonald was spotted walking outside in jail-issued pants with no shirt, and quickly captured. He now faces a felony escape charge. “The investigation is ongoing to determine how the inmate made it to the outside of the facility,” said sheriff’s department spokesman Raul Reyna.

Tunisia: On September 2, 2013, police and soldiers searched for 49 prisoners who had escaped from a facility in the southern coastal town of Gabes. Colonel Hicham Ouni, security director for Tunisia’s prisons, told the Associated Press that the prisoners were mostly young and none were incarcerated for terrorism-related crimes. Tunisia’s prison system is at more than triple capacity, with around 22,000 prisoners.

Utah: Christopher Stein Epperson, a former Wasatch County sheriff’s deputy, was charged with taking advantage of his position as a jail guard to physically abuse two female prisoners. [See: PLN, April 2012, p.1]. He pleaded guilty to the federal charges on August 29, 2013, and faces up to 10 years in prison for each of two counts of deprivation of rights under color of law.

Virginia: Former Augusta Correctional Center guard Brian Peduto was three months into serving a suspended sentence for attempting to have sex with a 12-year-old girl when he began having a sexual relationship with a minor. He was not spared prison the second time, and received a three-year sentence on August 26, 2013. Peduto apologized before he was sentenced, saying, "It's time for me to stay away from girls in general."

Washington: A riot broke out at the Pend Oreille County Jail on July 7, 2013, and ten prisoners now face additional charges as a result. Two cells were flooded during the disturbance, which caused water damage in an adjoining courtroom. Although no serious injuries were reported, one prisoner allegedly attacked a guard, another intimidated a witness and there were two prisoner-on-prisoner assaults. The jail was locked down for several hours following the riot.

Washington: Sarah Brooks, a prison therapist specializing in sexual deviancy treatment, was charged with engaging in sexual activity with a sex offender. [See: PLN, Sept. 2013, p.17]. Brooks pleaded guilty on August 20, 2013 to a lesser offense and was sentenced to 24 months on probation. As part of the plea deal she must also complete alcohol treatment and mental health counseling. According to prosecutors, Brooks developed a sexual relationship with a male prisoner; however, he did not want to press charges, which resulted in the reduced charge and plea deal. ■

An Interview with Noam Chomsky on Criminal Justice and Human Rights

ON FEBRUARY 5, 2014, PRISON LEGAL News editor Paul Wright interviewed Noam Chomsky, 75, at his home in Lexington, Massachusetts. Professor Chomsky is the foremost dissident intellectual in the United States, and for decades has been a prominent critic of U.S. foreign policy, human rights abuses, imperialism and the media's facilitation of same. He is also one of the world's eminent linguists and has been a professor of linguistics at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology since 1955. He was arrested and jailed for anti-war activism in the 1960s.

The author of dozens of books on politics, media analysis, foreign policy and other issues, Professor Chomsky was also one of PLN's earliest subscribers and has corresponded with Paul on various topics since the early 1990s. However, in his books, essays and interviews, Professor Chomsky has rarely addressed human rights abuses in the United States with respect to policing and prisons – until now.

While Professor Chomsky agreed to be interviewed by PLN, scheduling was difficult due to his extensive travel and speaking schedule. It turned out that the day of the interview was also the day a massive snowstorm hit Boston, and he did not come into work. He graciously agreed to conduct the interview at his home, and Paul and PLN advertising director Susan Schwartzkopf made an adventurous cab ride through the snowstorm to his house.

We extend our thanks to Professor Chomsky for this interview and to his assistant, Beverly Stohl, for making the necessary arrangements.

Noam Chomsky

News in Brief	56

...

PAUL WRIGHT: I think one of the things that's interesting is I've been reading your work since I was in high school, and I would say that for at least 30 years now, 30-plus years, I've been reading your work and all the interviews that you've done, and very few people ever ask you about domestic issues.

NOAM CHOMSKY: Really?

PW: Yes. About domestic stuff, in terms of ... you know, they ask you about human rights in other countries, but not about human rights in this country. I think you did one interview in the mid-90s which we reprinted in Prison Legal News.

NC: There are many. I don't know what happens to them. There are so many, I can't keep track. There's several a day.

PW: Okay. My first question, Professor Chomsky, is the United States talks about human rights abroad but not domestically. Why is that? Why aren't Americans deemed to have human rights while people overseas are?

NC: Well, first of all, it's not true that people overseas are. We talk about human rights in enemy states, but we don't talk about them in our own client states. So, for example, compare, say, Eastern Europe and Latin America. Eastern Europe was Soviet domain in the post-Stalin, post-Second World War period, up until 1990. Eastern Europe was dominated by the Soviet Union. And there's an enormous amount of discussion about human rights in Eastern Europe. Human Rights Watch, the organization, pretty much grew out of Helsinki Watch, which was concerned specifically with Eastern Europe.

Well, what about the U.S. domains during the same period? Say, roughly 1960 to 1990? You take a look at the scholarly literature, it's quite straight. Human rights in the U.S. domains of Latin America were under vastly greater attack than in Eastern Europe. It's true whether you look at the murders, torture, incarceration, slaughters the U.S. was carrying out, including a major war against the Church. The story after Vatican II, really, there were lots of religious martyrs.

So in 1989, the Berlin Wall falls. A lot of, you know, justified excitement; there's liberation in Eastern Europe. And what happens in Central America at that time? Well, shortly after the Berlin Wall fell, a Salvadoran brigade, the Atlacatl Brigade, U.S.-trained, U.S.-armed, fresh from renewed training at the John F. Kennedy School of Counter-Insurgency Warfare, under the orders of the high command, broke into the university and murdered six leading Jesuit intellectuals, leading Latin American intellectuals. Anything like that happen in Eastern Europe? I mean, people were, you know, Václav Havel was in prison, but he didn't have his head blown off. And this is the record all the way through. Is it discussed? No.

PW: And I think it's interesting that you use the example of Eastern Europe because we can note that since the collapse of the Soviet Union and Eastern bloc countries, I think it's no coincidence that we now learn that Eastern European countries, like Poland, Lithuania and elsewhere, are leading rendition states for the United States to set up its secret torture prisons where people can be kidnapped and tortured with impunity, which, arguably, did not happen under the Soviet Union.

NC: That's very interesting, in fact, because there was a study by the Open Society Forum of countries that had been involved in the U.S. rendition programs, and these, as you say, are kind of at the extreme end of commitment to torture. Taking suspects and sending them to countries like Syria or Egypt or Libya, where you know they're going to be tortured. Who participated? Well, of course, European countries mostly participated. The former Eastern European domains and Soviet Union did. The Middle East, of course, participated. That's where they were sending them to be tortured. One region of the world didn't participate.

PW: Latin America.

NC: Latin America. What happened is in the past 10 years, roughly 10-15 years, Latin America has pretty much extricated itself from U.S. domination. Not entirely, but substantially. This is a dramatic example of it. It's kind of doubly interesting because during the period when Latin America was pretty much controlled by the United States, it was one of the world centers of torture. And now that it's somewhat, pretty much liberated itself, it didn't participate in the massive U.S. torture programs. And actually it shows up in other ways, too.

The U.N. Economic Commission for Latin America [recently] published a report on poverty reduction in Latin America. I don't think it was reported here. But it's striking. What it basically shows is the usual. The more countries that were free of U.S. control, free to carry out reforms, the more they carried out extensive poverty reduction. So Venezuela, Brazil, other countries had a very sharp reduction in poverty. You get closer to home, say, Guatemala and Honduras, poverty remains extreme. Now the interesting case is Mexico. A rich country, relatively speaking, under the NAFTA umbrella, and practically the only country where poverty substantially increased last year.

These are very systematic properties. But are they discussed? No. So it's not just human rights in the United States that aren't discussed, it's in U.S. domains even when it is really dramatic. Like, for example, Central America.

As you know, the huge increase in incarceration in the United States was mostly since around 1980, and during those years Central America was subjected to really massive atrocities, all backed by the United States or carried out by the United States. Hundreds of thousands of people slaughtered. All kinds of torture. The murder atrocities. I mentioned one case, but it's vastly greater. Now you take a look at, say, immigration today; there's a big immigration problem in the United States. So, for example, people are coming to the United States illegally, undocumented aliens from the Mayan highlands in Guatemala. Why? Because they were practically wiped out in the early '80s by a really genocidal attack backed by President Reagan, who assured us that the general in charge was a nice guy committed to democracy and so on. So now the people in the areas that we helped destroy are fleeing for refuge to the United States, and President Obama has sent back [deported] two million, not just from there but from other places. None of this gets discussed except kind of at the margins.

PW: One of the things, too, is what I think of as a discussion of human rights and slaughters, and I think one of the things that's interesting with Guantanamo seems to be almost a quantitative departure. For over 60 years the United States ran a very successful counter-insurgency program around the world which consisted of kidnapping people, torturing whatever information they had out of them, murdering them and disappearing the bodies. They did this very successfully in the Philippines and Central America, as you know, with less success in Southeast Asia.

NC: Oh, there was plenty of success in Southeast Asia. Tiger cages in South Vietnam were major torture chambers.

PW: Sure. Exactly. But at some point, one of the things I find interesting is that with Guantanamo they've publicly acknowledged capturing people, though not always, hence the secret rendition prisons. But at least in Guantanamo they're publicly acknowledging that they've kidnapped people. They've pretty much publicly acknowledged that they tortured them extensively. And continue to torture them. But they aren't killing them and dumping the bodies, as they did for decades before that. Do you have any idea why that changed?

NC: Well, there is a difference. Some of the major scholarly work done on torture is done by Alfred McCoy, a historian.

PW: Yes. We've published his work.

NC: He's pointed out that there is a difference. The U.S. used to delegate torture to subsidiaries. It was sometimes carried out by U.S. operatives, but usually it was kind of delegated. The last couple of years it's been carried out by the U.S. It's pretty much the same thing, as you say, but there's a difference in direct participation. And in fact, he also points out that you could make a case that George Bush's resort to extensive torture is not illegal by U.S. law.

PW: No. It isn't.

NC: The U.S. never really signed or ratified the torture convention. There is a U.N. torture convention which the U.S. technically ratified, but after rewriting it to exclude the methods that are used by the CIA.

PW: Actually, the second question I was going to ask you was that the U.S. routinely signs international treaties on issues like torture and prisoners' rights. Then it holds there's no private causes of action for them and, of course, as you're noting right now, it doesn't fully ratify them or creates critical exemptions that prevent enforcement. So my question is, why sign them?

NC: Well, there are two steps. Signing and ratifying. Ratifying is what counts, otherwise nothing happens. But the U.S.

has ratified very few international conventions. I mean, even ones like the rights of a child and things like that; I think the U.S. and Somalia are the only countries that didn't ratify it. And in the very rare cases where the U.S. ratifies a convention, there's a reservation attached. It's called "non self-executing," which means, "inapplicable to the United States." So, for example, the U.S. did finally sign the genocide convention after 40 years, but with a condition: "not applicable to the United States."

That's actually been upheld by the World Court. Because under the Court rules, a country can be prosecuted only if it's accepted the jurisdiction of the Court. When Yugoslavia brought a case against NATO after the bombing in 1999, the United States withdrew from the case. And the Court accepted that because one of the charges was genocide and the U.S. is not susceptible to charges of genocide.

And this runs right through the record. In fact, even in 1946, when the U.S. pretty much led the establishment of the International Court of Justice, the World Court, it added a condition that the U.S. is not subject to any charges under international treaties such as the OAS Charter and the U.N. Charter. And the foundation of the U.N. Charter, of course, bars threats or use of force in international affairs. But the U.S. is not susceptible to that rule. And, in fact, that's kind of tacitly understood. So, for example, President Obama, high officials and others are constantly threatening force against Iran. That's what it means to say "All options are open."

PW: Sure. And every other country in the world, too.

NC: Well, they can do what they want, but if the U.S. were brought to the Court under that charge, they would appeal that it's not applicable. And, in fact, that was done. Nicaragua brought the United States to the World Court.

PW: For the mining of its harbors.

NC: Well, that was what the final charge was, because the main charges were thrown out by the World Court since they were charges of violations of the Organization of American States treaty against intervention. But the Court pointed out you can't charge [under the OAS treaty]. The U.S. is free from that.

PW: And, obviously, I think for Prison Legal News readers sitting in prison the idea that you're only susceptible to a criminal court's jurisdiction if you agree to it sounds like a pretty good deal.

NC: A pretty good deal. But, of course, if we go back to Guantanamo, the torture at Guantanamo was horrible. But it's kind of standard in American prisons.

PW: Actually, it is. When Abu Ghraib first happened, one of the things I've noticed over the many years of publishing Prison Legal News is that human rights abuses that occur overseas will get a lot of American media attention. But when the same abuse occurs in American prisons, being done by American officials to Americans, it gets very little attention or is largely ignored.

NC: It gets nothing. Take isolation. The U.N. and other authorities consider that torture. And, in fact, as is known, a short amount of [solitary confinement] drives people completely crazy.

PW: And we've done this for several hundred years.

NC: Yes. But that's standard in America, in American prisons. Almost total isolation for prisoners if they want to, and other treatment, too. There's a general principle that if we carry out a crime, it doesn't happen.

PW: Or it's not a crime.

NC: Either it's not a crime, or it doesn't happen. It literally doesn't happen. And that's true of the media. It's largely true of scholarship.

PW: Do you believe that Americans have fewer or more rights vis-à-vis state power than the citizens of other industrialized countries?

NC: We do, in fact. It's an unusually free country. Despite all of these crimes, which are real, it is nevertheless quite a free country for people who are relatively privileged. Not if you're a black kid in the slums of Boston. But if you're, say, living where we're talking now, you've got lots of rights. In many respects, more so than other countries. For example, freedom of speech, which is after all a crucial right, is protected in the United States to an extent beyond maybe any other country. Certainly other western countries.

PW: I find it ironic that you say that because our organization is involved right now, for example, ... we're going to trial in Georgia to protect our right to send prisoners letters where the jail bans all books and magazines. They only allow prisoners to send and receive postcards. And it's ironic in the age of the Internet, we're defending a 15th century means of communication.

NC: Yes, well, life is complex. Both things are true. The U.S. has set formally high standards for protection of freedom of speech, and they are pretty well implemented to the extent that you have a degree of privilege. Prisoners in Georgia are down at the opposite end. They don't gain the rights.

PW: Okay. The past 40 years have seen a massive increase in the U.S. prison population. The U.S. now imprisons more people than any other country in the world ever has, even including, you know, the Soviet Union at the height of the collectivization in the 1930s, even Nazi Germany. In your view, what has led to the rise of mass imprisonment in the United States?

NC: Primarily the drug war. Ronald Reagan, who was an extreme racist, barely concealed it under his administration. There had been a drug war but it was reconstituted and restructured so it became basically a race war. Take a look at the procedures of the drug war beginning from police actions. Who do you arrest? All the way through the prison system, the sentencing system, even to the post-release system.

And, here, Clinton was involved. Taking away rights of former prisoners, say, to live in public housing and so on. The lack of any kind of rehabilitation. The impossibility of getting back into your own community, into a job, essentially it demands recidivism. So there's a system in place, mostly directed against black males – although by now it's also African-American women, Hispanics and so on – but it's overwhelmingly been black males, which essentially criminalizes black life. And it has led to a huge increase in incarceration and essentially no way out.

It started with the Reagan years and goes on right up to the present.

PW: And what do you think is the basis for that?

NC: Well, it's kind of striking. First of all, it has a historical parallel which is worth thinking about. After the Civil War there were Constitutional amendments that freed slaves. And there was a brief period, roughly ten years, in which freed slaves had formal rights.

PW: Right, Reconstruction.

NC: The Reconstruction period. And it was not insignificant, like you had black legislators and so on. After the Reconstruction period, roughly a decade, there was a north-south compact which effectively permitted the former slave states to do essentially what they liked, and what they did was they criminalized black life. So, for example, if a black man was standing on a corner he could be accused of vagrancy and charged some fee which he couldn't pay, so he went to jail. If he was looking at a white woman the wrong way, somebody claimed attempted rape, you know. A bigger fine. Pretty soon they had a very large part of the black population – black male, mainly – in jail. And they became a slave labor force.

A large part of the American Industrial Revolution was based on slave labor in the post-Civil War period. And for U.S. steel and mining corporations and others, it was a wonderful labor force. I mean, much better than slavery. Slavery is a capital investment; you've got to keep your slave alive. [But] you can pick them up from the state system for nothing. They're docile. They're obedient. They can't unionize. They can't ask for anything. I mean, we're familiar with the chain gangs, but that's only the agricultural aspect of it. There was also an industrial aspect. This went on almost until the Second World War when there was a demand for free labor for the war industry. And we're essentially reconstituting it.

PW: Well, we've reported extensively on prison slavery in both the former, the older types as well as the modern ones. Prison Legal News has broken some of the major stories on that, but I think one of the bigger impacts now isn't the prisoners working. It's not the 5,000 prisoners working for private corporations or the 60,000 working for prison industries. It's the 2.3 million who aren't working at all. That's the impact on labor markets.

NC: Yes. But that's the difference between now and the latter part of the 19th century. The latter part of the 19th century was a period of the Industrial Revolution. Now it's quite different. It's industrial anti-revolution.

PW: Or devolution.

NC: In fact, what's really happening is this is a superfluous population. A lot of the working class is basically superfluous at a time when multi-national corporations can shift their production operations to northern Mexico or Vietnam or somewhere. And the black population has never escaped the effects of slavery; I mean, the first slaves came to the United States in the early 17th century. By 1620, there were slaves. And the effect of slavery has never been overcome, in all sorts of ways, so the most superfluous population is the black male population. Fine. So we stick them in prison. Get rid of them.

PW: One of the things, too, as you say this, there's obviously a number of black, racial minority political organizations in this country, and for the most part they've all been pretty silent about criminal justice policies over the past 40 years. If you look at a lot of the major organizations like the NAACP, the Urban League, folks like that, they've been pretty silent on criminal justice issues, and today we have President Obama, who obviously is black. So is our Attorney General. And, you know, while the Attorney General has made some noises on criminal justice issues, if you look at actual practices, nothing's really changed. So to an extent it seems that the political black community has largely been silent or supportive of mass incarceration.

NC: Well, yes. They have their own reasons. But there has been progress in civil rights which for the more privileged sector of the black community has meant more rights. And while I don't like to criticize them – as I said, they have their own reasons – I can see why they might want to try to expand the range of rights that they've achieved and not take on issues that would be unacceptable to the ruling groups.

Take a look at what happened to Martin Luther King, for example. It was very striking. When you listen to the oratory on Martin Luther King Day, it typically ends with his "I have a dream" speech in Washington, in 1963. But he didn't stop there. He went on to the north. He went on to northern racism, to class issues, urban problems in Chicago, then he was assassinated supporting a public workers' strike. That part of his life has been kind of wiped out. In fact, he lost his northern liberal popularity at that point. As long as he was attacking racist sheriffs in Alabama it was acceptable. When he started talking about racist and class-based oppression in the north, that was beyond the limits.

After all, when he was killed he was on his way to organizing a party of the poor. Not of the blacks. Of the poor. And that's beyond the pale when you do that. So, how much this kind of understanding resonates in the minds of black leadership I don't know, but they can't be oblivious to the phenomenon.

PW: And I guess one of the things, too, it's not just the black leadership of civil organizations, but we pretty much have a bipartisan consensus on mass imprisonment. I think it's like U.S. foreign policy, just like it has a bipartisan consensus. And we can see that over the past 40 years, to use your slavery analogy, looking back to recent modern history of 1980 or so, no one law at a time but thousands of laws every year around the country have led to mass imprisonment. There's never been one sweeping law, for example. But within mainstream political parties there's been no opposition to mass incarceration, whether it's mandatory minimums, draconian prison conditions or whatever. And why is there, for lack of a better term, mass consensus within the political elite and within the legislative bodies of this country on mass imprisonment?

NC: We're talking about a period of kind of a major neoliberal assault on the population which had all kinds of effects. One of them is that both political parties drifted to the right. There used to be a quip that the United States is a one-party state, the business party, which has two factions, the Democrats and the Republicans. It's not really true anymore. It's still a one-party state, the business party. But it has only one faction, and it's not Democrats. It's moderate Republicans. The contemporary Democrats are what used to be called moderate Republicans.

Meanwhile, the Republican Party has just drifted off the spectrum. The distinguished political conservative analyst, Norman Ornstein of the American Enterprise Institute, speaking from the right, describes the contemporary Republican Party as just what he calls a radical insurgency which has abandoned any commitment to functioning as a parliamentary party. It's just dedicated to extreme wealth and power. Period. And it's had to kind of mobilize popular forces of the kind that hadn't been politically mobilized much in the past, which is why you see what you do. But as both parties drifted to the right, yes, you get the consensus on rightwing policies. As I mentioned, Clinton's policies just made the incarceration system even harsher.

PW: Well, Clinton remains, I think, the worst thing that's happened to American prisoners not just in living memory but in American history. The laws that he passed, the Prison Litigation Reform Act, the Anti-terrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act among them. The elimina- tion of Pell Grants for prisoners to get an education in prison. And, you know, again, it's all happened with bipartisan consensus.

NC: I wouldn't call it bipartisan because we've lost the concept of [two parties]. There was a narrow spectrum of bipartisan division under the framework of the business party, and that's pretty much gone. The only question is, how rightwing are you? And somebody like Richard Nixon would be regarded as a liberal today.

PW: You know, he had some pretty good ideas, like the Environmental Protection Agency. I wouldn't see that passing today.

NC: In fact, they're attacking it now. The earned income tax credit, OSHA, you know. Nixon's reforms would be considered way off the spectrum now.

PW: In your view, what's the Obama administration's track record on domestic human rights issues?

NC: Well, I never frankly expected much of Obama.

PW: Neither did I.

NC: I wrote about him before the primaries even, in 2008, just using his own web page. But there was one thing that surprised me, and that's his attack on civil liberties. I don't understand it. It's gone way beyond anything I expected, and I don't even think he gets any political gain from it. I just don't understand what's driving it.

PW: Well, he did campaign as being a better technocratic manager.

NC: Yes, but why the attack on civil liberties? I mean, some of these attacks aren't even discussed much.

PW: Well, I think if you look at the rise of militarized policing, and that in this country the ruling class is fully geared up for a full-blown counter-insurgency. They barely have protests, much less resistance. It seems like they're just not taking any chances.

NC: That I can understand. But take something like one of the most extreme attacks, which barely gets discussed – the Humanitarian Law Project case. Here's a case where the Obama administration brought it to the courts, went up to the Supreme Court. They won. And what it does is expand the concept of material assistance to terrorism. Like if you're on the terrorist list and I give you a gun, so, okay, I'm complicit. The Obama administration expanded that to advice. To talk. The case in question [involved] a group that was giving legal advice to some group that's on the terrorist list, but the colloquy in the court extends it way beyond that.... That's a tremendous attack on civil liberties.

PW: And the right to free speech or the notion of....

NC: Of free speech. Yes. But it's barely even discussed. Incidentally, the whole concept of the terrorist list is a scandal which should never be accepted. The terrorist list is by executive order. No recourse.

PW: And no due process right as to how you get on or how you get off.

NC: Nothing. If you look at the record, it's appalling. Like, for example, Nelson Mandela was on it until a couple of years ago. And Saddam Hussein was taken off it because Reagan wanted to support him during the Iraq invasion of Iran.

PW: One of the things you've written extensively about is the impunity of American client state torturers in other countries, specifically like in East Timor and Indonesia and Central America. And yet here in the United States human rights abusers such as policemen kill unarmed, innocent civilians. In Prison Legal News, we report routinely in every issue of our magazine about prisoners who are just outright murdered, directly through use of excessive force by prison and jail staff, as well as much more commonly through medical neglect, through the withholding of adequate medical care. And yet the government officials who do this enjoy virtual impunity. Occasionally there are a few criminal prosecutions. There are civil suits, but government officials have a broad range of immunities. And, again, those only seek money damages and, statistically, are not very successful. So in your view, what accounts for this virtual impunity for American and domestic human rights abusers?

NC: In part, impunity is automatic if it's not discussed. It's barely even discussed. Who talks about it?

PW: No one. Well, Prison Legal News does, but....

NC: Yes, I know, but anywhere near the mainstream there's just no discussion of it. The number of people in the country who even know about it outside the prisoners' families is very slight. And if things are not even a topic of discussion, sure, there's going to be impunity. And all of this reflects the fact that it's simply accepted in the elite culture.

We want to protect ourselves – privileged white people. What happens to the rest, this is not our business. You know, Guantanamo itself is pretty remarkable. So, for example, the first case that came up under Obama was the Omar Khadr case. He was kidnapped in Afghanistan. He happened to be a Canadian citizen, [and] was a 15-year-old kid who was in a village which was attacked by American troops.

PW: And, also, it was interesting since when are soldiers on the battlefield deemed to be war criminals when defending themselves on the battlefield?

NC: This is a 15-year-old child. Foreign soldiers are attacking his village. And he's accused of defending it. So he was taken, he was kidnapped. He was put in Bagram, which is worse than Guantanamo, I think, for several years. Then he was moved to Guantanamo. More torture. Finally, he came to trial where he was given a choice. Of course, his lawyers have to make the choice. The choice was, plead innocent and you'll stay in Guantanamo forever, or worse. Or plead guilty and you'll only have to stay for eight more years. And it was public. Did you see any outcry about it? I mean, the very idea of kidnapping a child for the crime of defending his village from aggression, it's so scandalous you don't know what to say about it.

PW: Well, we follow Guantanamo fairly closely, and one of the things I think is interesting now is that as soon as the prisoners start talking about being tortured or how they've been tortured, the judges immediately cut off the sound system. And so they can't even talk about the torture they've endured, so it's not even ...you know, we've got multiple layers of impunity.

NC: It goes beyond that. So, for example, there's one Australian citizen, David Hill, who was kidnapped in Afghanistan, sold by bounty hunters to the American army. He was held in prison for years in Afghanistan, Bagram and other prisons, and finally Guantanamo. Horrible prison story. Finally, after a lot of negotiations, the Australian government began to intervene slightly. They hadn't done much. And he was released.

He wrote a book about it – a detailed book describing his years of torture, humiliation, how it worked in Afghanistan, what it was like in Guantanamo. Did you read a review of it? It's more than the judges cutting off testimony. It's when material is published in our open, free society, it is deep-sixed. This is not the only case by any means.

PW: This is in the context, as you're mentioning atrocities that are occurring today, that if you look at The New York Times, for example, books that are being published, I was recently reading a review not too long ago, by, I think, Applebaum, about human rights violations under Stalin. And it's like, okay, so The New York Times is still mulling over human rights violations that happened 70 years ago in the Soviet Union, but nary a word or very little about what's actually occurring today by the American government.

NC: And again, I think maybe one of the most striking cases is just the comparison of post-Stalin Eastern Europe with U.S. domains in the same period, like Central America or South America. It's almost not discussed. I mean, some of the things that happened are kind of mind-boggling. Like, for example, right after the murder of the Jesuit intellectuals, something which never happened in Eastern Europe post-Stalin....

PW: Even under Stalin, I don't think they were....

NC: Well, not that way. I mean, there were plenty of purges and monstrosities.

PW: They weren't doing it openly.

NC: Yes, but remember, this is under the orders of the high command, very close to the American Embassy. The troops had just returned from further training in the United States and they carried out this atrocity. Okay. A couple of days after that, there was a visit to the United States by Václav Havel, a Czech dissident who suffered under....

PW: And became president.

NC: Yes. And he addressed a joint session of Congress, and he received massive applause, standing ovations when he praised the United States as the defender of freedom – the defender of freedom that was just responsible for the slaughter of half a dozen of his counterparts in Central America. You take a look at the press after that; the liberal press was just swooning with admiration. Why can't we have wonderful intellectuals like this who praise us for being defenders of freedom, and we've just carried out huge atrocities? Anthony Lewis wrote about how we're in a romantic age, you know, and there's no comment on this. It just passes as if it's normal.

I mean, it's happening right at this moment. Take the crimes going on in Iraq, especially in Fallujah. In Fallujah, there's an insurgent force being attacked by the Iraqi army. There are many laments here in the press about "the pain we suffer after American boys fought to liberate Fallujah. Look what's happening." How did American boys fight to liberate Fallujah? It's one of the major war crimes of the 21st century. You take a look at the record, even as it was just reported in the press.

PW: Yes. They flattened the city.

NC: They surrounded the city. They cut off food. They allowed people to escape but kept the male population inside, and then they went in and mostly slaughtered them. We don't know how many because we don't count our crimes.

PW: And the U.S. has been doing that since at least the 1850s.

NC: Well, you know, but now we suffer pain because the American boys fought to liberate it. I mean, there's no comment on this. And, in fact, people here don't know what happened. Or in England, incidentally. There was just a poll in England recently, people were asked how many Iraqis they thought had died during the war. The mean answer was 10,000.

PW: If you ask them how many Jews died in the Holocaust, everyone knows those numbers.

NC: Yes, I mean, that's like you know probably 5% of the number. There were some efforts to get the British press to publish something about it. Most were rejected.

PW: Let me ask you this while we're on the subject of people dying. Why are the U.S. and Japan the only industrialized countries that judicially execute their own citizens through use of the death penalty? And notice I didn't say "kill" because we're going to leave out the extra-judicial murders and death squads which most governments engage in when they're threatened.

NC: That's true that most countries have abandoned the death penalty.

PW: Formally.

NC: The United States is different, sometimes in interesting ways. I happened to be in Norway a couple of times last year. I was there fortuitously, you remember the Anders Breivik massacre?

PW: Yes.

NC: So I was there just at the time when he was captured and identified. And then I was there again at the time when he was sentenced. And it was very interesting to see just the attitudes of the population. The question of the death penalty never arose. He was treated as a human being who had carried out a horrible crime, but he's a human being. At the court proceedings he was permitted to rave and rant on as long as he wanted. The sentence finally was, I think, 21 years.

PW: Which was the maximum allowed under Norwegian law.

NC: Which was the maximum, with the possibility of rehabilitation. The circumstances of his imprisonment would seem like a luxury hotel by U.S. standards. And this was accepted, you know? It wasn't bitterly denounced. The attitude was, well, yes, we have to treat people humanely even when they've carried out a shocking massacre. He killed, I think, what, 70 children? Can you imagine what would have happened here?

PW: I don't know. It's interesting because I was imprisoned in Washington State, and you have Gary Ridgway who ultimately pleaded guilty to kidnapping, raping and murdering, I think it was 51 women, mostly prostitutes, and ultimately he was sentenced to life without parole. And yet at the same time you have people in Washington State, which has the three-strikes law, on their third offense they're sticking their finger in their pocket, pretending it's a gun and robbing an espresso stand. And they get life without parole. So you can say that the equivalency of the punishment for sticking your finger in your pocket and pretending it's a gun to rob someone is the same whether you're doing that or if you're killing 51 people.

NC: Well, as soon as you have any contact with the prison system, what you discover is appalling. I don't have to tell you. For example, in one of the demonstrations in the early '60s in the south, I was with Howard Zinn. We went to Jackson, Mississippi for a demonstration and at one point we were able to get the police chief to take us through the Jackson prison, which, I should say, by the standards of northern prisons, wasn't too bad. I've been in worse ones. Just, you know, under civil disobedience arrests.

But as we were walking through the halls, of course they were all black men, you know, a child tapped on the bars. He was in the prison and he asked me if he could have a drink of water. So I asked the police chief, "Can I get him a drink of water?" He said, "Okay." When we got back to his office, I asked did he know why that child was in the jail? So he asked some secretary who looked it up, and it turned out that the child had been found in the streets and they didn't know who he was, and they had nothing special to do with him, so they put him in jail.... How much of this goes on?

PW: Actually, it still goes on. Prison Legal News has reported cases of mentally ill children in Florida who, for lack of any place to care for them, they wind up in the prison system.

NC: This kid wasn't even mentally ill. They just didn't know what happened. Maybe he got lost, or whatever it might have been. If it had been a white kid, he wouldn't have been put in jail.

PW: Yes. And I think that one of the things we've seen increasingly in the last 30 years – it goes back to what you talk about as a system of class and race control – is that the solution for everything in this country domestically seems to be prison. We may not have public housing for the poor, but we've got prisons. I think it goes back to Governor Cuomo using HUD funds for low-income housing to build prisons, which, in a grotesque way, is low-income housing.

NC: Unfortunately true. A lot of it. And the racism is really severe and can't be overlooked. The whole record of white supremacy in the United States is beyond anything that was known.

PW: Well, one of the things that I find interesting is that Prison Legal News has sued a number of jails around the country, and when you go to jurisdictions like the District of Columbia, Atlanta and places like Birmingham, we find that the prisoners are still mostly black but the elected officials, the sheriffs, the prosecutors, the mayors, the judges, huge portions of the police force and most of the guards, they're all black too, and the conditions are as bad if not worse than they were under Bull Connor, their white counterparts, 40 or 50 years ago.

NC: That's pretty common. If you go to South Africa, remember, the worst crimes were carried out by black forces mobilized by the white government. It's the way coercive systems operate.

PW: So, basically, what's more important is who's doing it rather than the color of who's doing it.

NC: There are all kinds of reasons why people, individuals do what they do, but it's very standard to co-opt oppressed people to carry out crimes and atrocities for the government. I mean, take, say, England and India. Some of the worst crimes were carried out by Indian troops, Indian Sikh police. In fact, England sent them all over the world to impose imperial rule.

PW: One of the things you've talked about is race, and yet we've got two-and-a-half million people in prison and even when we talk about race, no one is claiming that wealthy black people or Hispanics are being herded into prison in significant numbers. So what accounts for the virtual absence of the wealthy from the U.S. prison population?

NC: The virtual absence of....

PW: Of the wealthy from the prison population? That should be an easy question. Well, they're rich.

NC: Do I even have to answer? I'll give you an anecdote. We're living in a pretty well-to-do suburb, right? You can see that when you walk around. Once we were away, the neighbors called and told us there was a broken window in the house. So we came back and took a look, and it turned out somebody had broken in. We called the local police and they came and the first thing they asked us was, "is there a pillowcase missing?" So we looked upstairs, and yes, there was a pillowcase missing. Then they said, "We want you to take a look in your medicine cabinet." So we looked, and yes, somebody had rummaged through the cabinet. And they said, "Well, we know who's doing this. This is teenage kids who live here, and they're going sort of house to house, and if they find one that's easy to break into, they'll go in and see if they can get drugs." They said, "We know who they are, and we could arrest them. But it's no use. Their parents will have them out of jail tomorrow." That's a typical example.

Or, say, let's go way high up. Last week there were news reports about the fact that Jamie Dimon, CEO of JPMorgan Chase, just had his salary almost doubled. Why? It was in gratitude because he had saved the bank directors from going to prison and they were only fined $20 billion for criminal activities. Well, $20 billion, first of all, a lot of it's tax deductible and the rest is kind of a statistical error on their accounts. Now here's a guy who was supervising criminal activities serious enough to cause a $20 billion fine. Is anybody in jail? What would have happened if this was a kid who robbed a store?

PW: Yes, that's the joke. Rob the 7-11 for $20 and get 20 years. And, you know, rob other people of $20 billion and you get a raise.

NC: That's class-based justice.

PW: Do you see the criminal justice system, police and prisons, as a tool of class war domestically?

NC: Class war and race war. It's been very clearly, especially since Reagan; it's very hard to see it as anything other than a kind of race war. There is kind of a reasonably close class-race correlation in the United States, to some extent you can't....

PW: The racial minorities are disproportionately poor.

NC: Yes. But it goes beyond that. I mean, as I said, from police practices up till post-sentencing, it's sharply racially discriminatory. But, you know, it's a racist country since its origins. I mean, it's even familiar in scholarship. There's a major study of white supremacy by George Fredrickson, a well-known historian. He basically compares South Africa and the United States, but it's really a comparative study. His conclusion is there is nothing anywhere in South Africa or anywhere else to compare with the horror of white supremacy in the United States. Actually, it is so deeply ingrained that none of us even notice it. I mean, for example, take President Obama. He's called a black president. In Latin America he wouldn't be called a black president.

PW: Right.

NC: He'd be called one of the various gradations of mixed race. But the United States still has kind of tacitly, not formally, the principle of one drop of black blood. That's deep-seated racism.

PW: I have a black Cuban friend. We were in prison together, and he once told me that he didn't know he was black until he came to the United States. He said in Cuba he was just Cuban. And then he comes here and....

NC: Or mulatto. There's a whole bunch of gradations of mixed race, but here the racism is extreme. You can see it coming back to Reagan. So he opened his 1980 campaign in Philadelphia, Mississippi. A tiny little town. Why pick that? Nobody knows anything about it except one thing. They murdered civil rights workers there. Did that affect the campaign?

PW: Yes. Arguably, that's what led to him winning the Presidency.

NC: It leads to Obama calling him a great transformative figure, you know.

PW: My final question is at this point, after 40 years of mass incarceration with militarization of the police, we've had a massively expanding prison and jail system. We've seen some small dips in [prison population] numbers in the last year or two in the United States. It's too soon to tell if that's just a statistical anomaly.

NC: I don't think it's an anomaly. I think it's just gotten to a point where it's kind of economically unfeasible to maintain it.

PW: My question is, do you see any prospect of permanent change in U.S. prison and criminal justice policies and practices in the near future?

NC: Sure. I mean, if you went back 60 years, you couldn't have predicted the achievements of the Civil Rights Movement.... You couldn't have predicted the women's movement, which completely changed things for half the population. After all, if you go back to the early days of the Republic, under law, women were not persons. They were property. A woman was the property of her father, transferred to her husband.

And in fact it wasn't until 1975 – not that long ago – that the Supreme Court recognized that women were peers. They had a legal right to serve on federal juries. Prior to that they weren't peers. And that's sort of the core of being a person under law. You couldn't have predicted it. And you can't predict what will happen in the future; it depends how people act. If they become organized, militant, active, the system of coercion is pretty fragile and I think it can crack very quickly.

PW: Do you know who Thomas Mathiesen is? The Norwegian criminologist?

NC: Yes.

PW: One of his quotes that I've always thought about, and this is in the context that I recall when the Soviet Union collapsed and I have a degree in Soviet history, is that no one predicted that one coming.

NC: One of the people who didn't predict it was [former CIA director] Robert Gates, who was a Soviet specialist. He didn't predict it even after it was happening.

PW: And, you know, Mathiesen's comment is that systems of repression appear to be stable right up until the moment they collapse.

NC: That's right.

PW: And so do you think that's possible?

NC: This is a very fragile system here. I think it can crack very easily.

PW: Why do you say it's fragile?

NC: Because there is very little coercive force behind it. By comparative standards, the state in the United States has quite limited capacity for violent repression. I mean, what happens is unacceptable, but again, by comparative standards it is not high.

PW: By comparative standards, are you referring to....

NC: Western countries.

PW: So you would say, for example, in England, that their police and military has more domestic repressive capacity?

NC: I think so. And, in fact, they have much harsher constraints on even things like freedom of speech.

PW: Yes. The libel laws are pretty outrageous.

NC: Horrifying. And how fragile it is, let's take Norway again, which you mentioned. The famous Norwegian criminologist Nils Christie wrote a history of punishment.

PW: I've read it. It's one of my favorite books.

NC: Right. And if you remember, in the early 19th century, Norway was outlandish.

PW: All the Scandinavian countries were.

NC: Horrifying, horrifying crimes. And now they're remarkably humane. Things can change.

PW: Okay. Well, this is one of the few times we end anything on an optimistic note in Prison Legal News. Thank you very much. ■

THIS MONTH'S INTERVIEW WITH NOAM Chomsky is part of PLN's ongoing series of interviews with notable people who have diverse views of the U.S. criminal justice system. Prior interviews have been conducted with well-known actor Danny Trejo, media mogul and millionaire Conrad Black, and wrongfully convicted former prisoner Jeff Deskovic. We hope that these interviews serve to further what passes for discussion and debate on this country's criminal justice system in general and prisons in particular.

We still need to expand our circulation in order to keep our subscription rates as low as possible; since most publishing-related costs are fixed, the higher our circulation the lower our per-issue expenses for things like printing, postage and layout, which helps keep our costs – and thus our subscription rates – low.

This $49.95 value is yours if you subscribe for four years or extend your existing subscription for four years. If you write to PLN, please try to be as concise as possible as our office staff is limited and it saves time if you can let us know the purpose of your letter in the opening paragraph. Informing us that you have filed a lawsuit is not useful until there has been a ruling on the merits, at a minimum.

Lastly, look in this issue of PLN for

$2.25 Million Jury Verdict against LCS in Texas Prisoner Death Suit

by Matt Clarke

ON OCTOBER 24, 2012, A FEDERAL JURY in Texas awarded $2.25 million to the estate and survivors of a prisoner who died at a facility operated by LCS Corrections Services (LCS), after finding the company was 100% at fault. The district court subsequently reversed its dismissal of § 1983 claims against LCS and granted a new trial as to those claims.

Mario A. Garcia was incarcerated at the Brooks County Detention Center (BCDC) in Falfurrias, Texas, owned and operated by LCS, when he died of a seizure on January 12, 2009. After Garcia was booked into BCDC, his wife delivered a supply of clonazepam, a prescription anti-anxiety medication he had been using for years, to the facility. BCDC officials received the medication but did not give it to Garcia because they allegedly had a policy of refusing to allow prisoners to take any controlled substances, even bona fide prescription medications.

Garcia began shaking badly later that day. He was taken to the emergency room, treated and returned to BCDC. The prison's contract physician, Dr. Michael Pendleton, saw Garcia twice – the last time on January 8, 2009. After the second visit with Dr. Pendleton, Garcia's condition deteriorated rapidly; he was admitted to the prison's medical unit with uncontrollable shaking on January 10 and remained there until he had a seizure and died two days later.

Garcia's estate, widow, son and parents filed a civil rights action pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983 in federal court that alleged failure to provide adequate medical care plus state law claims of wrongful death and gross negligence. Garcia's father died a few months prior to trial, after which his mother agreed to a confidential settlement.

The district court had previously dismissed the § 1983 claims against LCS, finding that because Garcia was a federal prisoner the company was acting under color of federal law – and § 1983 claims only apply to deprivations of rights under color of state law.

At trial on the plaintiffs' remaining claims, experts testified that Garcia could have been saved had he been taken to a hospital on January 10, and might not have had the seizure at all had he not been denied his medication. LCS named Dr. Pendleton as a responsible third party and claimed he was 75% at fault. The jury found that neither Pendleton nor Garcia was at fault, but rather LCS was 100% responsible for Garcia's death.

The jury awarded Garcia's estate $500,000 for personal injury and past pain and suffering. His widow received a total of $500,000 in damages, and the jury awarded Garcia's son $1.25 million for loss of companionship and mental anguish. The total award against LCS was $2.25 million plus prejudgment interest at a rate of 5%.

On March 25, 2013, Garcia's widow filed a motion for a new trial on the § 1983 claims that had been dismissed, noting that another federal court in the Southern District of Texas had found LCS was a state actor because it derived its authority to operate a prison from the State of Texas, even though the facility housed federal prisoners.

Ohio: Attorney General May Not Increase Sex Offender's Registration Requirements

IN APRIL 2013, AN OHIO APPELLATE court ruled that a sex offender, who was required by virtue of a California conviction to register his address annually for ten years, could not subsequently be indicted, after moving to Ohio and being reclassified under the Adam Walsh Act, for failing to register every 90 days.

Ansuri Ameem was convicted in California of sexual assault and pandering. Classified as a sexually-oriented offender under the former Megan's Law, Ameem was required to register his address annually for ten years.

In July 2007, after moving to Ohio, that state's attorney general reclassified Ameem as a Tier III offender under the Adam Walsh Act. The reclassification subjected Ameem to an increased obligation to register – specifically, every 90 days for life. Ameem failed to register as required and was indicted in July 2010.

After unsuccessfully moving to have the indictment dismissed on grounds that the Ohio attorney general's reclassification was unconstitutional, Ameem pleaded no contest to failing to register.

On appeal, the Eighth Appellate District of the Court of Appeals held that the attorney general's reclassification of Ameem from Megan's Law to the Adam Walsh Act was invalid. Relying on Ohio Supreme Court precedent, the appellate court found that the reclassification violated the separation of powers doctrine because it would allow the executive branch to review or overrule a decision made by the judicial branch.

The Court of Appeals further noted that Ameem's case was not affected by the Ohio Supreme Court's decision in State v. Brunning, 2012 Ohio 5752, 983 N.E.2d 316 (Ohio 2012), which held that "despite an offender who was originally classified under Megan's Law being wrongly reclassified under the Adam Walsh Act, the state could still maintain a prosecution for a violation of the reporting requirements as long as the alleged violation also constituted a violation of Megan's Law."

Accordingly, Ameem's conviction for failure to register was reversed. See: State v. Ameem, 2013 Ohio 1555 (Ohio Ct. App. 2013); 2013 Ohio App. LEXIS 1448. ■

The Inadequacy of Prison Food Allergy Policies

by Jamie Longazel and Rachel Archer

MICHAEL SAFFIOTI WAS ARRESTED ON a misdemeanor marijuana charge and held at the Snohomish County Jail (SCJ) in Washington State. On the morning of July 2, 2012, he arrived at the center of his module where breakfast was being served. Because he had a severe dairy allergy, Saffioti examined very closely the pancake and oatmeal he was given. Video footage obtained by local news agency KIRO-7 showed him discussing his food with guards, servers and fellow prisoners. This was not the first time Saffioti was held at the SCJ, so his allergy was on record. Yet jail staff had brought no special diet trays to his module that morning; they instead simply removed the pancake from his tray and assured him the oatmeal would be safe to eat.

After taking just a few bites, Saffioti began to experience shortness of breath. Video footage showed him approaching a guard's desk, where reports say he asked for his inhaler and to see a nurse. He was given the inhaler but his request for a nurse was denied, and shortly afterwards he was sent back to his cell. Once there, according to a subsequent lawsuit, he pressed his call button and repeatedly asked when the nurse would arrive. By looking closely at the video footage, one can see how he later began jumping up and down in his cell, seeking assistance. Thirty-five minutes later a guard found Saffioti unconscious. After attempts to perform CPR were unsuccessful, he was rushed to a nearby hospital where he was pronounced dead.

Saffioti's tragic death raises many important questions about food allergy policies in U.S. prisons and jails – a subject that has been relatively overlooked, likely to the detriment of many prisoners. The federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) estimates that 0.2% to 3.5% of all prisoners suffer from food allergies. And a recent study by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention reported a 50% increase in food allergies among children since 1997. With approximately 2.2 million people confined in U.S. prisons and jails today, this means prison food allergy policies impact as many as 77,000 prisoners and likely many more in years to come, including some like Saffioti whose allergies are so severe that meal choices can literally mean life or death.

As far as we can tell, there is no reliable data on how common it is for prisoners with food allergies to die or otherwise suffer from unmet dietary needs. We do know that prisoners file a fair number of lawsuits pertaining to food allergies each year. Given the many legal obstacles confronted by those challenging the conditions of their confinement, these cases are likely just the tip of the iceberg. In an effort to shine more light on the issue, we sent public records requests to all fifty states (we received responses from 39), asking about the food allergy policies used in their prison systems.

Three observations become apparent after analyzing these policies. The first is that many are lacking – in some cases, substantially. The implication is that some prisoners likely suffer from food allergies that the facilities at which they are confined do not recognize. An official in Kansas responded to our inquiry by noting that they “do not have a procedure in place on this subject.” California – whose prison system houses more than 117,000 people (as many as 4,000 with food allergies, if the BOP's estimate is accurate) – has a very vague policy that places limits on the therapeutic diets that physicians are able to order for prisoners. Neighboring Oregon only recognizes food allergies that are “life threatening.” This policy thus excludes prisoners who suffer from soy allergies, for example, a condition that the Mayo Clinic notes is “rarely ... life threatening” but could nonetheless cause substantial discomfort with symptoms that include tingling in the mouth, hives, swelling, abdominal pain, diarrhea, nausea or vomiting.

New Hampshire's policy identifies only certain allergies as “acceptable” – specifically, the “main food allergies (i.e. onion, tomato, egg, and peanut).” Saffioti's severe dairy allergy would not have been recognized under this policy, nor would someone suffering from a wheat or gluten allergy, among many others. Georgia draws a slightly different line between allergies that are acknowledged and those that are not. They “honor the following Food Allergies: Milk, Egg, Wheat, Gluten, Fish/Shellfish, Peanut/Nut, Chocolate, and Tomato.”

The second observation is that even among states that do acknowledge an array of allergies, prisoners face a substantial burden in becoming eligible for alternative diets. Many states require that an allergy be “verifiable and documented,” and that “written medical proof” be provided. This means either that prisoners must have had access to allergy tests before their confinement – which for the uninsured can cost hundreds of dollars – or that they be tested while behind bars. In the latter case, the trouble is that some states impose limits on who can be tested for food allergies.

For example, Arizona’s policy stipulates: “Inmates should only be allergy tested when there is sufficient evidence to do so.” This raises concern for those who suffer from allergies where physical symptoms are absent, such as celiac disease. As the National Digestive Diseases Information Clearinghouse points out, “People with celiac disease may have no symptoms but can still develop complications of the disease over time. Long-term complications include malnutrition – which can lead to anemia, osteoporosis, and miscarriage, among other problems – liver diseases, and cancers of the intestine.” In other words, a diet can be doing substantial harm to a prisoner’s body and some existing food allergy policies provide no means by which that harm can be avoided.

At least one state has a policy in place that actually deters prisoners from being tested for food allergies. Kentucky’s policy permits prisoners to take an allergy test, but stipulates that prisoners will be charged for tests that come up negative. One can assume that this is an attempt to root out false claims, but even if it succeeds in doing so, the policy may disaffect those who really do suffer from allergies. As Food Allergy Research and Education points out, allergy tests “do not always provide clear-cut answers” and patients “may have to take more than one test before receiving [a] diagnosis.” Even under the circumstances when all the hoops are jumped through and prisoners do manage to furnish acceptable “proof” of their allergy, a number of states require continual renewal of such proof, usually every 90 days.

A final observation is that the burden is often on the prisoner to make choices about their food. This is not to say that prisoners with food allergies should not be well aware of their condition and have a firm understanding of how to respond in the event of an allergic reaction, but rather to point out the lack of institutional support for food allergy issues. Choices about what to eat and what to avoid are especially difficult to make when prisoners are served food they did not prepare. Yet some institutions tell prisoners to fend for themselves, often without recognizing how difficult doing so can be.

Take Oregon’s policy, for example: “We encourage inmates to self-select from the line. For example, if an inmate has a peanut allergy and we are serving peanut butter & jelly sandwiches, they may select the meal alternative tray which consists of beans, rice, vegetables, fruits, and bread.” South Carolina’s policy similarly states little more than the obvious: “If an inmate notifies medical staff of a food allergy, the medical staff will instruct the inmate to avoid that allergy in his/her food choices.” Georgia’s policy is that once a prisoner receives a food tray, they are considered compliant. This policy also brings Saffioti’s case to mind, for technically after servers handed him the pancake and oatmeal breakfast tray, he would have been considered compliant and his desperate attempts to learn the contents of the food would have been irrelevant in a lawsuit.

In conclusion, our content analysis of prison food allergy policies provides cause for alarm. Granted, it is possible that prison staff go beyond what is listed on policy forms in helping prisoners meet their dietary needs. However, given the conditions of confinement that have characterized our nation’s overcrowded prisons in this era of mass imprisonment, we have little reason to be so optimistic. Consider that in the realm of health care, containment has taken precedent over healing, as was recently exposed in California’s sweeping Brown v. Plata class-action lawsuit.

Along similar lines, cost cutting rather than nutritional adequacy seems to be increasingly emphasized in the realm of prison food. A recent Prison Legal News article, for example, detailed the great lengths that Aramark – a company that contracts with more than 600 correctional facilities – goes through to cut costs. A class-action lawsuit filed by prisoners in Illinois protesting the high amounts of soy in their diet is another example of providing prison food “on the cheap” to the detriment of prisoners’ health. The likelihood that prisoners with food allergies have their needs met is thus diminished as they confront not just a set of inadequate policies, but also a system whose main concern is not their health and well-being. 🍷

Jamie Longazel is an Assistant Professor of Sociology at the University of Dayton, Ohio. He is co-author (with Benjamin Fleury-Steiner) of the book, The Pains of Mass Imprisonment (Routledge, 2013). Rachel Archer is a Criminal Justice Studies major at the University of Dayton who has research interests in the areas of food allergies, law and prison conditions. They provided this article exclusively for Prison Legal News.

Kitchen Supervisor Gets Prison Time for Sexually Abusing Two Prisoners

A CIVILIAN PRISON EMPLOYEE'S SEXUAL abuse of two prisoners at a federal facility in Phoenix, Arizona was made public after an FBI surveillance camera captured the lascivious details of their ménage à trois.

According to a rather explicit criminal complaint filed on August 29, 2012 in U.S. District Court, Carl David Evans, the kitchen supervisor at FCI-Phoenix, traded packs of cigarettes for oral sex with two male prisoners identified only as "J.I." and "E.D." Evans was charged with two counts of sexual abuse of a ward and one count of providing contraband.

Prison officials learned in June 2012 that Evans was "engaged in a sexual relationship" with at least one prisoner, according to FBI Agent Tyler Woods. Investigators hid a video camera in the food storage area in the kitchen where the alleged sex acts were taking place, and recorded Evans' work shifts for an entire week.

Woods then reviewed the video and discovered footage showing Evans, J.I. and E.D. entering the storage area. E.D. was heard asking Evans and J.I. if they were "ready to suck some dick." Evans locked the door, and the trio then had mutual fellatio on top of some food sacks.

E.D., who worked as a cook, told FBI investigators that beginning in April 2012, Evans gave him a pack of cigarettes every two weeks that he sold to other prisoners for as much as $150 each. Evans exacerbated the relationship when he became "aggressive physically," according to E.D., asking him to take off his shirt and then proceeding to play with his nipples.

E.D. estimated that Evans performed oral sex on him 15-20 times. Once, E.D. alleged, Evans brought K-Y gel and placed a condom on him, and the men briefly engaged in anal sex before E.D. had a change of heart.

J.I. told investigators that he engaged in oral sex with Evans and E.D. three times, only because he knew that E.D. had access to food and "benefited from his relationship with Evans," according to the complaint.

Evans pleaded guilty to five of the federal charges in February 2013, and seven other charges were dropped. He was sentenced on July 3, 2013 to 36 months in prison, three years of supervised release and a $5,000 fine. Evans has since appealed his sentence to the Ninth Circuit. See: United States v. Evans, U.S.D.C. (D. Ariz.), Case No. 2:12-cr-01634-SRB. ■

$15.5 Million Settlement for Mentally Ill Jail Detainee Held in Solitary Confinement

A MENTALLY ILL DETAINEE WHO WAS placed in solitary confinement in a New Mexico county jail for nearly two years, without adequate medical or mental health care, accepted a $15.5 million settlement for violations of his civil rights.

Stephen Slevin, 59, served almost 22 months in solitary confinement between 2005 and 2007 at the Doña Ana County Detention Center in Las Cruces, New Mexico. On January 24, 2012, a federal jury awarded him $22 million. The award was upheld by a federal judge after county officials challenged it as being excessive, but Slevin decided in February 2013 to accept a $15.5 million settlement and end the legal battle without further appeals.

"It has been a long and hard fight to bring Mr. Slevin justice," said one of his attorneys, Matthew Coyte. "This settlement, although very large, does not give back to Mr. Slevin what was taken from him, but if it prevents others from enduring the pain and suffering he was subjected to, then the fight has been worthwhile."

Slevin's ordeal began on August 24, 2005, when he was booked into the jail on charges of driving while intoxicated and receiving or transferring a stolen vehicle.

"He was driving through New Mexico and arrested for a DWI, and he allegedly was in a stolen vehicle. Well, it was a car he had borrowed from a friend; a friend had given him a car to drive across the country," said Coyte.

Slevin had a lifelong history of mental illness. He was found to have suicidal tendencies by former Doña Ana County Detention Center medical director Daniel Zemek. As a result, Slevin was placed alone in a bare, padded cell for a few days, then moved to the medical center and finally transferred to solitary confinement in October 2005. He remained there for the next 18 months.

When he entered the jail, Slevin "was a well-nourished, physically healthy, adult male with a mental illness." On May 8, 2007, he was transferred to the New Mexico Behavioral Health Institute (NMBHI) for a psychiatric review.

According to Slevin's civil rights complaint, when he was admitted to NMBHI he smelled, his beard and hair were overgrown and he had a fungal skin infection. He was also malnourished, weighed only 133 pounds and complained of paranoia, hallucinations, bed sores and untreated dental problems. He was disoriented and clueless to the fact that he had spent the last 18 months in solitary confinement.

Slevin received mental health care at NMBHI, and the reintroduction to human interaction and socialization brought back his alertness and awareness. After only 14 days of treatment, however, Slevin was returned to the Doña Ana Detention Center where he was again placed in solitary confinement.

As before, his mental health began to deteriorate. The failure of jail officials to act on his requests for dental care forced Slevin to pull his own tooth while in his cell. His toenails "grew so long they curled under his toes," the Albuquerque Journal reported.

Slevin was finally released on June 25, 2007 after the charges against him were dismissed. He claimed he had never seen a judge and was placed in solitary confinement with no explanation from jail officials.

Slevin sued for deprivation of his civil rights. At trial, Zemek admitted that he couldn't remember ever having visited Slevin in solitary confinement during the time he worked as the jail's medical director, and accepted responsibility for being the person who was supposed to oversee Slevin's health care.

"There were circumstances beyond my control that contributed to that, my failure. I take the blame, yes," he testified. Zemek also said he had informed county officials that he felt the jail did not have enough medical staffing.

At the conclusion of the six-day trial, the jury found Doña Ana County Detention Center director Christopher Barela liable for depriving Slevin of his constitutional rights to humane conditions of confinement, adequate medical care and procedural due process, awarding Slevin $3 million in punitive damages.

The jury found Zemek liable for $3.5 million in punitive damages for the same types of violations, and also found that a municipal policy, implemented by the Board of Commissioners for the County of Doña Ana, resulted in violations of Slevin's rights under the Americans with Disabilities Act as well as various torts, including false imprisonment. The jury awarded $15.5 million in compensatory damages against the defendants.

The Las Cruces Sun-News reported in early 2013 that the County of Doña Ana is responsible for paying $9.5 million of the settlement, while the county's insurance provider will cover the remaining $6 million. See: Slevin v. Board of County Commissioners for the County of Doña Ana, U.S.D.C. (D. NM), Case No. 1:08-cv-01185-MV-SMV. ■

Colorado Prisoner who Murdered Guard Gets Life Without Parole

LAST MONTH, PRISON LEGAL NEWS reported that the parents of a slain Colorado prison guard did not want the prisoner who murdered him to face the death penalty. Edward Montour, who beat Lima Correctional Facility guard Eric Autobee to death in October 2002, was initially sentenced to death but that sentence was overturned in 2007.

Montour faced the death penalty again in a retrial, but Eric Autobee's parents, Bob and Lola, who now oppose capital punishment, wanted to provide a victim impact statement to the jury urging them not to impose a death sentence.

"A lot of people think because I forgave him [Montour], I don't want to hold him accountable or have him punished," Bob Autobee stated. "That's not true. People that do these things have to be punished, but death is not the answer."

Eighteenth Judicial District Attorney George Brauchler objected to the Autobees' request to provide a victim impact statement, arguing that such statements could only be for punitive and not mitigating purposes. [See: PLN, March 2014, p.24].

Before murdering Eric Autobee, Montour was serving a life sentence for killing his 11-week-old daughter, Taylor, which he claimed was an accident when she fell and hit her head. On February 27, 2014, the El Paso County coroner's office changed the cause of Taylor's death from homicide to undetermined, and a group of experts retained by Montour's defense counsel said her injuries were consistent with an accident.

Defense attorneys had intended to argue at trial that Montour's mental illness became worse after he was wrongfully convicted of killing his daughter, culminating in his fatal attack on Eric Autobee in the kitchen at the Lima Correctional Facility.

However, on March 6, 2014, Montour pleaded guilty to murdering Autobee in exchange for a sentence of life without parole; he said he owed the plea to Autobees' parents. Even if he is eventually exonerated in his daughter's death, he still must serve a life sentence for killing Eric Autobee.

"I had to get as much justice out of this situation as I could," Brauchler said in reference to offering the plea bargain to Montour. ■

U.S. Supreme Court: District Courts Can Make Federal Sentences Consecutive or Concurrent to Future State Sentences

ON MARCH 28, 2012, THE U.S. Supreme Court held that a federal district court may impose a federal prison term that is consecutive to an anticipated future state court sentence. In February 2014, the Third Circuit ruled that a district court's ability to impose such a sentence only applies at the time when the federal sentence is imposed.

Monroe Ace Setser was on probation for a drug charge when he was arrested in Texas on a new charge of possession with intent to deliver a controlled substance. After Setser was indicted on the new drug charge, the state moved to revoke his probation. A federal grand jury then indicted him on the federal offense of possession with intent to distribute 50 grams or more of methamphetamine, based on the same incident that had resulted in the new state drug charge.

This did not constitute double jeopardy based on the legal fiction that it is permissible to pursue state and federal charges for the same criminal conduct under the "dual sovereignty" doctrine.

Setser pleaded guilty to the federal charge and was sentenced to 151 months in prison. The federal judge made Setser's sentence consecutive to the sentence he would receive in the probation revocation proceedings, but concurrent with the sentence he would receive for the new state drug charge.

Setser appealed. While his appeal was pending, the state sentenced him to five years in prison for the probation revocation and 10 years for the new drug charge, with both sentences to run concurrent. This made it impossible to implement the federal sentence as ordered by the district court.

Regardless, the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed his federal sentence, holding that the district court had the authority to run a sentence consecutive to a future state sentence that had not yet been imposed, and that the sentence was reasonable even if “partially foiled” by the state court’s decision to make the state sentences concurrent. Setser filed a petition for writ of certiorari in the U.S. Supreme Court, which was granted.

The Supreme Court held that the traditional broad discretion that federal judges enjoy when imposing sentences includes the ability to make a sentence consecutive to an anticipated state sentence, and that such a determination is not left for the Bureau of Prisons to decide. However, in this case the sentence pronounced by the federal judge could not be carried out because the state court had made the probation revocation and new drug charge sentences concurrent.

In such a case, the Supreme Court held that the Bureau of Prisons “ultimately has to determine how long the District Court’s sentence authorizes it to continue Setser’s confinement. Setser is free to urge the Bureau to credit his time served in state court based on the District Court’s judgment that the federal sentence run concurrently with the state sentence for the new drug charges. If the Bureau initially declines to do so, he may raise his claim through the Bureau’s Administrative Remedy Program. See 28 CFR § 542.10 et seq. (2011). And if that does not work, he may seek a writ of habeas corpus.”

The judgment of the Fifth Circuit upholding Setser’s federal prison sentence was therefore affirmed. See: Setser v. United States, 132 S.Ct. 1463 (2012).

On February 12, 2014, the Third Circuit Court of Appeals applied the ruling in Setser to find that while a district court can decide whether to run a federal sentence concurrent or consecutive to a future state sentence that has not yet been imposed, it can do so only at the time of sentencing on the federal charges.

Defendant Michael Sharpe was sentenced to 144 months in federal prison in 2004; he expired his sentence in May 2013 and was remanded to Pennsylvania officials for a parole violation. He then filed a motion in the district court seeking reconsideration of his federal sentence, requesting that the court run it concurrent with his subsequently-imposed Pennsylvania state sentence.

The district court held it did not have jurisdiction to modify Sharpe’s sentence, which was affirmed on appeal. The Third Circuit found that Setser “holds merely that district courts have such authority” at the time the federal sentence is imposed when deciding whether federal sentences are to be made concurrent or consecutive to future state sentences.

The appellate court further noted that “even if the District Court had been authorized to modify Sharpe’s federal sentence, that is not really what he was asking the court to do. Sharpe’s federal sentence has expired and he is now serving a state-court sentence. Thus, Sharpe is really seeking to modify his state sentence on the ground that it should (or should have) run concurrently with his federal sentence. That is a matter for Pennsylvania authorities, not the federal courts.” See: United States v. Sharpe, 2014 U.S. App. LEXIS 2653 (3d Cir. 2014) (unpublished). ■

Lowering Recidivism through Family Communication

by Alex Friedmann

THERE ARE CURRENTLY 2.2 MILLION people held in prisons and jails in the United States,<sup>1</sup> and an estimated 95% of prisoners currently in custody will one day be released. Based on 2012 data, around 637,400 people are released annually from state and federal prisons.<sup>2</sup>

According to an April 2011 report by the Pew Center on the States, the average national recidivism rate is 43.3%.<sup>3</sup> Based on that average rate, an estimated 276,000 released prisoners can be expected to recidivate each year, many committing new crimes and returning to prison.

This negatively impacts our communities in several ways, including the societal costs of more crime and victimization as well as the fiscal costs of reincarcerating ex-prisoners who commit new offenses – at an average annual cost of $31,286 per prisoner, according to a 2012 report by the Vera Institute.<sup>4</sup>

Studies have consistently found that prisoners who maintain close contact with their family members while incarcerated have better post-release outcomes and lower recidivism rates.

These findings represent a body of research stretching back over 40 years. For example, according to “Explorations in Inmate-Family Relationships,” a 1972 study: “The central finding of this research is the strong and consistent positive relationship that exists between parole success and maintaining strong family ties while in prison. Only 50 percent of the ‘no contact’ inmates completed their first year on parole without being arrested, while 70 percent of those with three visitors were ‘arrest free’ during this period. In addition, the ‘loners’ were six times more likely to wind up back in prison during the first year (12 percent returned compared to 2 percent for those with three or more visitors). For all Base Expectancy levels, we found that those who maintained closer ties performed more satisfactorily on parole.”<sup>5</sup>

These findings still ring true. An article published in August 2012 in Corrections Today, a publication of the American Correctional Association, titled “The Role of Family and Pro-Social Relationships in Reducing Recidivism,” noted that “Family can be a critical component in assisting individuals transitioning from incarceration because family members provide both social control and social support, which inhibit criminal activity.... In contrast, those without positive supportive relationships are more likely to engage in criminal behavior.”<sup>6</sup>

men and women who maintain contact with supportive family members are more likely to succeed after their release.... Research on people returning from prison shows that family members can be valuable sources of support during incarceration and after release. For example, prison inmates who had more contact with their families and who reported positive relationships overall are less likely to be re-incarcerated.”<sup>7</sup>

Another Vera Institute report, published in 2011, stated: “Research shows that incarcerated people who maintain supportive relationships with family members have better outcomes – such as stable housing and employment – when they return to the community. Many corrections practitioners and policy makers intuitively understand the positive role families can play in the reentry process, but they often do not know how to help people in prison draw on these social supports.”<sup>8</sup>

According to research published in Western Criminology Review in 2006, “a remarkably consistent association has been found between family contact during incarceration and lower recidivism rates.”<sup>9</sup>

Correctional practices that “facilitate and strengthen family connections during incarceration” can “reduce the strain of parental separation, reduce recidivism rates, and increase the likelihood of successful re-entry,” according to a 2005 report by the Re-Entry Policy Council.<sup>10</sup>

A 2003 study by the Washington, D.C.-based Urban Institute, “Families Left Behind: The Hidden Costs of Incarceration and Reentry,” as revised in 2005, noted: “Research findings highlight the importance of contact among family members during incarceration. Facilitating contact has been shown to reduce the strain of separation and increase the likelihood of successful reunification. Studies comparing the outcomes of prisoners who maintained family connections during prison through letters and personal visits with those who did not suggest that maintaining family ties reduces recidivism rates.”<sup>11</sup>

Also, a 2004 study by the Urban Institute stated, “Our analysis found that [released prisoners] with closer family relationships, stronger family support, and fewer negative dynamics in relationships with intimate partners were more likely to have worked after release and were less likely to have used drugs.” The study authors, Christy Visser, Vera Kachnowski, Nancy La Vigne and Jeremy Travis, concluded, “It is evident that family support, when it exists, is a strong asset that can be brought to the table in the reentry planning process.”<sup>12</sup>

It is thus abundantly clear that maintaining close family relationships during incarceration results in lower recidivism rates and therefore less crime, which benefits society as a whole. Yet in spite of this clear correlation, corrections officials often do little to encourage contact between prisoners and their family members.

There are three primary forms of communication available to prisoners: letters, visits and phone calls.

With respect to letters, many prisoners are illiterate or functionally illiterate, which frustrates correspondence. A 2007 report by the National Center for Education Statistics found that 39% of prisoners scored “below basic” for quantitative literacy testing, while another 39% scored at only a “basic” level.<sup>13</sup>

Other studies likewise have found high levels of illiteracy or poor written communication skills among prisoners, which makes letter-writing as a means of regular contact between prisoners and their families problematic.

Further, an increasing number of jails are adopting postcard-only policies, whereby prisoners can only receive, and sometimes send, mail in the form of postcards – a very limited means of correspondence. [See: PLN, Nov. 2010, p.22]. Such policies place additional burdens on communication between prisoners and their families; PLN and other organizations have challenged postcard-only policies in various jurisdictions, including Florida, Tennessee, Oregon, Washington and Michigan. [See: PLN, Jan. 2014, p.42; Nov. 2013, p.24; June 2013, p.42; Jan. 2012, p.30; Sept. 2011, p.19].

In regard to visitation, a November 2011 study by the Minnesota Department of Corrections examined recidivism rates for 16,420 ex-prisoners over a five-year period, comparing rates for those who received visits while incarcerated and those who didn’t. The study found that “Any visit reduced the risk of recidivism by 13 percent for felony reconvictions and 25 percent for technical violation revocations, which reflects the fact that visitation generally had a greater impact on revocations. The findings further showed that more frequent and recent visits were associated with a decreased risk of recidivism.”<sup>14</sup> [See: PLN, May 2013, p.1].

However, prison officials often make visitation an unpleasant process, including lengthy waits, onerous searches, restricted visitation times and rigid enforcement of often petty rules. For example, one female attorney said she was told by prison officials that she could not visit a prisoner because her underwire bra set off the metal detector.

After leaving, removing her bra and then returning, she was told she could not visit because she wasn’t wearing a bra.

According to the 2011 Vera Institute study, “Many family members also indicated that prison rules and practices – including searches, long waits, and inconsistent interpretations of dress codes for visitors – can be unclear, unpleasant, too restrictive, and even keep people from visiting again.”

Due to such problematic issues with visitation, and because prisoners are frequently housed at facilities located far from their families which makes in-person visits difficult (federal prisoners, for example, may be held at any federal prison in the United States), phone calls are a primary means of maintaining family contact.

As acknowledged by the largest prison phone company in the nation, Global Tel*Link: “Studies and reports continue to support that recidivism can be significantly reduced by regular connection and communications between inmates, families and friends – [a] 13% reduction in felony reconviction and a 25% reduction in technical violations.”<sup>15</sup>

Kevin O’Neil, president of Telmate, another phone service provider, agreed, stating, “The more inmates connect with their friends and family members the less likely they are to be rearrested after they’re released.”<sup>16</sup>

When the Federal Communications Commission voted in August 2013 to reduce the cost of interstate prison phone calls nationwide, the issue of rehabilitation and recidivism played a contributing role in the FCC’s decision.

As stated by FCC Commissioner Mignon Cylburn: “Studies have shown that having meaningful contact beyond prison walls can make a real difference in maintaining community ties, promoting rehabilitation, and reducing recidivism. Making these calls more affordable can facilitate all of these objectives and more.”<sup>17</sup>

The FCC’s order imposing rate caps on interstate prison phone calls went into effect on February 11, 2014, though other parts of the order have been stayed by the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals. [See: PLN, Feb. 2014, p.10].

Notably, numerous corrections officials filed objections to the FCC’s plan to impose rate caps, and intrastate (in-state) prison phone rates, which were not affected by the FCC’s order, remain high. Meanwhile, prisons and jails nationwide have received hundreds of millions of dollars in “commission” kickbacks from prison phone companies, and such kickbacks have long resulted in inflated phone rates that create financial barriers to communication between prisoners and their family members. [See: PLN, Dec. 2013, p.1; April 2011, p.1].

In conclusion, although research has consistently found that regular contact between prisoners and their families results in better post-release outcomes and lower recidivism rates, corrections officials have done little to facilitate – and have sometimes deliberately frustrated – such communication with respect to written correspondence, visitation and phone calls.

Investments in prison-based literacy programs and less restrictive mail policies, revising visitation policies to encourage visits by family members, and reducing intrastate prison and jail phone rates would provide prisoners with greater opportunities to maintain close relationships with their families, leading to lower recidivism rates and less crime in our communities.

Few corrections officials seem willing to take such actions, though, which is a strong indicator that reducing recidivism – thus reducing the size of our nation’s prison population and the associated costs – is not one of their priorities. ■

Iowa: Parole Agreement Does Not Constitute Voluntary Consent that Justifies Warrantless Search

LAST YEAR THE SUPREME COURT OF Iowa reversed a parolee’s conviction on drug charges, holding that his acceptance of a search condition in a parole agreement did not constitute voluntary consent, and therefore a warrantless, suspicionless search of his car was unreasonable and violative of his rights under the search and seizure clause of the state constitution.

While on parole in 2009, Isaac A. Baldon III was subjected to a search of his person, the motel room where he was staying and his car, all pursuant to a consent-to-search provision in the parole agreement that Baldon, like all Iowa parolees, was required to sign as a prerequisite to being released on parole. The police found a large quantity of marijuana in Baldon’s car and charged him with drug-related offenses.

Baldon moved to suppress the marijuana from the search of his vehicle, arguing that his signing of the parole agreement did not constitute voluntary consent to searches of his person or property. The district court denied the motion and found him guilty of the charges.

On appeal, the Iowa Supreme Court reversed the judgment. Analyzing the issue of consent on state constitutional grounds, the Court concluded, in a thoughtful opinion, that the standard search provision contained in Baldon’s parole agreement did not represent a voluntary grant of consent to searches. Notably, this finding rested on provisions in the Iowa constitution, and the Supreme Court noted that many courts in other jurisdictions “have concluded that consent-search provisions in probation agreements constitute a waiver of search-and-seizure rights.” See: State v. Baldon, 829 N.W.2d 785 (Iowa 2013). ■

Update on Missouri Incarceration Reimbursement Act Case

PRISON LEGAL NEWS PREVIOUSLY reported a decision by the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel for the Eighth Circuit, which held that a Missouri bankruptcy court was correct in concluding that state prison officials did not violate a discharge injunction by collecting money from a prisoner's account for incarceration costs that accrued after the injunction was filed.

In 2009, Missouri prisoner Zachary A. Smith was initially ordered to pay $87,830.13 to cover the costs of his incarceration through March 2007 under the Missouri Incarceration Reimbursement Act (MIRA), plus future costs that accrued until his release from custody. He filed a Chapter 7 bankruptcy petition in 2010 and received a discharge in March 2011, effectively voiding the MIRA judgment.

In September 2012, however, prison officials seized funds deposited into Smith's prison account for costs that had accrued after he filed for bankruptcy. Smith sought a contempt ruling from the bankruptcy court, alleging the state had violated the discharge injunction. The bankruptcy court agreed that the MIRA judgment was void with respect to costs accrued as of the date of the bankruptcy filing, but held the judgment remained valid as to future incarceration reimbursement costs. The Eighth Circuit affirmed on February 5, 2013. [See: PLN,

Smith then filed a Rule 74.06(b) motion in circuit court, arguing that the state could not seize assets from his prison account for MIRA judgments that were unknown at the time of the MIRA hearing, citing State ex rel. Koster v. Cowin, 390 S.W.3d 239 (Mo. Ct. App. 2013) and State ex rel. Koster v. Wadlow, 398 S.W.3d 591 (Mo. Ct. App. 2013).

In a March 6, 2014 letter to PLN, Smith wrote: "The Chapter 7 [bankruptcy] was necessary to discharge the MIRA debt, but I had to argue that the AG's office could not be reimbursed with assets that were not identified and not known at the time of the MIRA hearing – meaning the AG could not impose future costs for incarceration against me unless it was shown to come from a current stream of income" that existed when the MIRA judgment was entered.

The state conceded, filing a satisfaction of judgment in the circuit court on October 16, 2013, and the MIRA liens against Smith were subsequently removed. Smith, who handled the litigation pro se, noted that Missouri prisoners facing MIRA judgments can successfully challenge them. See: State of Missouri v. Smith, Cole County Circuit Court (MO), Case No. 07AC-CC00109-01. ■

No Discipline for Oregon Prosecutor and Defense Counsel for Illegal Confinement of Mentally Ill Defendant

ALTHOUGH THE OREGON STATE BAR initially decided to pursue disciplinary charges against the district attorney for Washington County and a criminal defense attorney who represented a mentally ill defendant, for causing the defendant's illegal confinement, the charges were later dropped.

Donn Thomas Spinosa stabbed his wife to death on May 10, 1997, reportedly because she wouldn't give him money to play video poker. He was found unable to aid and assist in his defense and sent to the Oregon State Hospital (OSH) for mental health treatment.

Under Oregon law, Spinosa could be held at OSH for no more than three years. When he was still not competent to stand trial in 2000, the criminal charges against him were dismissed and he was civilly committed.

The civil commitment order was renewed annually until 2010, when Washington County District Attorney Bob Hermann claimed that OSH officials told him they were considering discharging Spinosa. An OSH official denied his claim.

In October 2010, Hermann refiled aggravated murder charges against Spinosa, who was again found unable to aid and assist in his defense and returned to OSH.

Hermann and Spinosa's defense counsel,

Robert B. Axford, then filed a joint motion asking Washington County Circuit Court Judge Thomas Kohl to issue a permanent “magistrate mental illness hold” requiring Spinosa’s indefinite confinement at OSH and prohibiting his release without approval by the court. This was unusual because Oregon law does not recognize, or allow for, a “magistrate mental illness hold.”

Nevertheless, Hermann argued that the hold was necessary due to the “woeful inadequacy of Oregon law” with respect to dangerous mentally ill defendants. He admitted that he and other prosecutors dislike the civil commitment process because it removes mentally ill offenders like Spinosa from the criminal justice system.

Neither Hermann nor Axford offered authority for the legality of a magistrate mental illness hold, because no such authority exists. Regardless, Judge Kohl signed the order and dismissed Spinosa’s murder charges. The order cited no legal authority for the hold and simply referred to Hermann’s memorandum.

In December 2011, retired Circuit Court Judge Jim Hargreaves filed complaints with the Oregon State Bar (OSB) against Hermann and Axford, as well as a judicial complaint against Judge Kohl.

Hargreaves noted in the OSB complaints that state law does not allow for a magistrate mental health hold. “Such an order is entirely without legal foundation in Oregon and stripped Mr. Spinosa of all his rights and protections,” he wrote. Hermann, Axford and Kohl had agreed to an “undeniably invalid order” to sidestep the law, he alleged.

An unrepentant Hermann called the OSB complaint a “cruel irony” given that he, Axford and Judge Kohl had agreed on a solution that they felt best for the public and for Spinosa – even though that solution was unsupported by state law.

Hermann and Axford told the OSB that they believed the order was valid and did not intentionally violate the law. The OSB evidently disagreed, as it voted in September 2012 to pursue disciplinary charges against the two attorneys for unmeritorious legal positions and engaging in conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice.

Meanwhile, Judge Kohl granted OSH’s request to dismiss the questionable magistrate mental illness hold, and Spinosa remained at the hospital under a regular civil commitment order.

Disability Rights Oregon (DRO) launched its own investigation following news reports about Spinosa’s situation, according to Bob Joondeph, the organization’s executive director.

Upon completion of that investigation, DRO issued a report in July 2012 that found Hermann, Axford and Kohl had acted outside the law in creating and imposing the magistrate mental illness hold. The legislature makes the law, the report noted, but in Spinosa’s case the attorneys and judge “essentially created a new law that allows for a person with mental illness to be detained without the elements of due process.”

In September 2013, the Oregon State Bar rescinded the charges against Hermann and Axford. “Most notably, the OSB’s case rested on a belief that Hermann and Axford crafted an order essentially to bypass Oregon’s civil commitment process in order to permanently institutionalize a criminal defendant without due process of law,” the agency said in a statement. However, the OSB concluded that the attorneys had tried to initiate, rather than circumvent, civil commitment proceedings.

Hermann said the OSB had made the right decision, and noted the case had prompted the state legislature to pass Senate Bill 421 in July 2013, which created new civil commitment procedures for people who are mentally ill and deemed “extremely dangerous.”

In other words, the legislature created the law that did not exist when Hermann, Axford and Judge Kohl ordered Spinosa to be held indefinitely at OSH. 🖱

Montana: Hospitalized Prisoner Entitled to Continuance in Divorce Case

THE MONTANA SUPREME COURT HELD on March 5, 2013 that refusing to grant a hospitalized prisoner's motion for continuance of a divorce trial was an abuse of discretion.

David and Lori Eslick were married on August 15, 2005. In December 2010, David began serving a sentence in the Montana State Prison (MSP), and Lori filed for divorce.

David was unrepresented and appeared telephonically at all court hearings. A June 12, 2012 pretrial conference and June 25, 2012 trial were scheduled. David failed to appear at the pretrial conference, which was rescheduled for June 19, 2012.

David's failure to appear or communicate with opposing counsel and the court was due to an unexpected medical emergency. On May 5, 2012, he was hospitalized for amputation of septic toes and part of his foot as a result of diabetes. Due to complications he remained hospitalized until June 11, 2012, then was confined in the MSP infirmary for the following week.

David did not receive his mail and could not attend court proceedings during this time, or schedule phone calls with the trial court. On June 18, 2012 he mailed a motion to the court seeking a 60-day continuance.

When David did not appear at the June 19, 2012 pretrial hearing, the court entered a default judgment against him on June 26, 2012, dissolving the marriage, despite having received his motion requesting a continuance.

The Montana Supreme Court reversed, concluding that "David has demonstrated good cause for granting his motion for a continuance. David's unexpected medical emergency and the conditions of his incarceration were circumstances beyond his control that prevented his appearance at the final pretrial conference."

The Court also concluded that David had suffered prejudice, as the trial court had "entered its findings of fact, conclusions of law, and default decree of dissolution without the benefit of David's arguments." The case was therefore reversed and remanded for a new pretrial conference and trial. See: In re Marriage of Eslick, 2013 MT 53, 304 P.3d 372 (Mont. 2013). ■

Arkansas Suing Prisoners for Incarceration Costs

ARKANSAS OFFICIALS ARE SUING PRISONERS under the State Prison Inmate Care and Custody Reimbursement Act (Act), seeking reimbursement for the costs of their incarceration by obtaining court orders and seizing money from their prison trust accounts.

For example, a state court entered an order requiring prisoner Michael R. MacKool to pay reimbursement costs, and the state sought a similar judgment against prisoner Deral Plunk. Both were subject to orders that confiscated the funds in their accounts for placement in a court account pending the outcome of the litigation.

MacKool is serving a cumulative 60-year sentence for first-degree murder and theft of property. In October 2010, Arkansas filed a petition against him in state court under the Act. Following a show-cause hearing, $5,016.61 in MacKool's prison account was ordered deposited into the state treasury; he appealed that judgment, which was affirmed. See: MacKool v. State, 2012 Ark. 287 (Ark. 2012).

On rehearing, he argued the court had incorrectly held that his lack-of-due-process argument had not been presented to the circuit court. Next, he claimed money he had received from his mother was not part of his "estate" as that term is used in the Act. Finally, he argued his equal protection rights had been violated.

The due process claim was based on the funds in MacKool's prison account being ordered confiscated on October 18, 2010, but the court did not provide him with notice until over two weeks later. The Arkansas Supreme Court found the only time that MacKool pointed to this issue was during opening statements, which the Court held is not an occasion for argument; an opening statement is an outline of the evidence to be introduced and the nature of the issues to be tried. Thus, MacKool had failed to properly present the due process argument before the circuit court and could not raise it on appeal.

As to the definition of "estate," the Supreme Court held the plain language of the Act “reflects that any money received by an inmate, including a gift from a family member, is part of his ‘estate’ for purposes of this statute.” Finally, the Court refused to hear the equal protection claim because MacKool had failed to raise it in his original briefs. See: MacKool v. State, 2012 Ark. 341 (Ark. 2012).

The state also filed a petition under the Act to seek reimbursement of incarceration costs from prisoner Deral Plunk. It secured an order to confiscate $7,007.47 from his prison account to hold in a court account until the litigation was concluded. Plunk moved to dismiss the action, and the state moved to transfer the case to another circuit court.

That court denied Plunk’s motion but granted the state’s motion. Plunk appealed. The Arkansas Supreme Court held that because neither part of the order constituted a final order, it was unappealable. As a result, Plunk’s motion to proceed in forma pauperis on appeal was denied. See: Plunk v. State, 2012 Ark. 362 (Ark. 2012).

More recently, on October 31, 2013, a U.S. District Court in Arkansas ruled against state prisoner Michael Williams, who challenged the seizure of funds from his prison account that he had received as a judgment in a § 1983 lawsuit against jailers at the Miller County Detention Center. In March 2013, the district court had awarded Williams $10,350 in damages and costs in the suit. Pursuant to a state court order under the Act, however, $8,530.95 was confiscated from the judgment funds after they were deposited in his prison account.

Williams moved the district court to enjoin the state from seizing the judgment awarded in his § 1983 suit, which the court construed as a motion under Fed.R.Civ.P. 69, “invoking the Court’s inherent power to enforce its judgments.” However, the district court held it did not have jurisdiction to grant the motion after the judgment had been satisfied by the payment of funds to Williams.

The court noted that the Eighth Circuit “has previously held a state may not attach to section 1983 judgment proceeds awarded to an inmate for the purpose of recouping incarceration costs,” citing Hankins v. Finnel, 964 F.2d 853 (8th Cir. 1992); however, “the facts presented here do not fit within the narrow parameters of that precedent.” The district court found that the prohibition against the state’s seizure of funds obtained in a § 1983 lawsuit for reimbursement of incarceration costs does not apply when the judgment in the suit was obtained from a non-state party – in this case, from Miller County.

“Therefore, the entity paying Williams’s judgment proceeds and the entity seeking to attach to the judgment proceeds are entirely distinct, thus, eliminating any Hankins type concerns over the deterrent effect of a section 1983 award,” the district court concluded. ## Texas: False Arrest and Malicious Prosecution Result in $411,865.18 Recovery

A TEXAS PROBATIONER SUBJECTED TO false arrest and malicious prosecution has been awarded $169,000 in damages plus attorneys' fees and costs.

Thomas Hannon, 37, unemployed and on probation, had an outstanding arrest warrant for probation revocation. Dallas police knew he was at a local hotel, and on August 1, 2007, police officers arrested several people, including Hannon, at the hotel in connection with a black bag that contained drugs, a .357 revolver and materials related to identity theft. Hannon was jailed on gun, drug and identity theft charges. He was exonerated and released more than 10 months later.

Hannon sued several police officers, but only his claims against officers Jerry Dodd, David Nevitt and Randy Sundquist survived to reach trial. The evidence showed that when the officers arrived at the hotel, Hannon had been waiting for a ride. He was not part of the initial arrest and began walking down the highway.

Police officers were notified that Hannon was walking away, and pursued and arrested him. Prior to the arrest, Hannon had been with a friend. The friend was carrying the black bag with the gun and drugs, but Hannon contended he was never in possession of the bag or knew what it contained.

The police report prepared by Dodd indicated that Nevitt saw Hannon with the bag before the arrest; Nevitt never indicated in the report that he saw Hannon possess the bag, but he later testified to that fact. Nevitt further testified that he never dealt with the hotel clerk.

It was proven that Nevitt lied. Surveillance video showed Hannon's friend had the bag and Hannon was never in possession of it. The clerk testified that Nevitt had in fact requested a copy of the surveillance video from him. Hannon contended that Dodd and Nevitt falsified the police report to maliciously prosecute him; he also noted that Dodd failed to inform federal officials, who were investigating the identify theft, that he had been exonerated.

With respect to injuries, Hannon conceded he would have been arrested in any event and required to serve a month on the probation revocation, but said he remained jailed for 10 months as a result of the false arrest and malicious prosecution, which caused him severe depression and anxiety.

On February 3, 2012, a federal jury found that Hannon did not possess the bag and Dodd and Nevitt had violated his rights. Hannon was awarded $93,500 for mental anguish and wrongful confinement against Nevitt and Dodd jointly and severally, $500 in punitive damages against Dodd and $75,000 in punitive damages against Nevitt, for a total of $169,000.

On March 14, 2013, the district court denied the defendants' motions for a new trial and judgment as a matter of law. The court also awarded attorneys' fees to Hannon in the amount of $241,042.73, plus $1,591.81 in attorneys' costs and $4,414.16 in Hannon's costs. The court further awarded $2,591.71 in costs against Hannon in favor of defendant Sundquist, who prevailed at trial.

On May 8, 2013, pursuant to a joint motion filed by the parties, the district court vacated the judgment and dismissed the case after a settlement was reached in which the City of Dallas agreed to pay a total of $411,865.18 in combined damages, attorneys' fees and costs. Hannon was represented by Dallas attorneys Scott Palmer and John E. Wall, Jr. See: Hannon v. Nevitt, U.S.D.C. (N.D. Tex.), Case No. 3:09-cv-00066-N. ■

California Supreme Court: Challenge to Booking Fee Order Forfeited Due to Failure to Object in Trial Court

ON APRIL 22, 2013, THE SUPREME Court of California, resolving a conflict among lower state courts, held that a defendant who fails to contest a jail booking fee order when it is imposed forfeits the right to challenge the order on appeal.

After pleading no contest to being a convicted felon in possession of a firearm, Antoine J. McCullough was sentenced to a state prison term of four years. When imposing the sentence, the trial court also ordered McCullough to pay a jail booking fee of $270.17.

On appeal, McCullough argued that although he had not objected when the trial court imposed the booking fee, he was entitled to challenge it for the first time on appeal because the evidence was insufficient to support a finding that he was able to pay the fee.

The Court of Appeal affirmed the booking fee order, holding that Mc-Cullough's failure to object in the trial court meant he had forfeited his right to challenge the imposition of the fee on appeal. The California Supreme Court granted review to resolve a split among the appellate courts on this question.

The Supreme Court initially held, as a matter of statutory construction, that the state law which authorizes the imposition of a booking fee – Government Code § 29550.2, subd. (a) – requires the trial court, before ordering payment, to determine the defendant's ability to pay. The Court then cited the general rule that a right may be forfeited if the defendant fails to timely assert it, and found no reason to deviate from that rule with respect to McCullough's challenge to the booking fee order.

Accordingly, the judgment of the Court of Appeal was affirmed. See: People v. McCullough, 56 Cal. 4th 589, 298 P.3d 860 (Cal. 2013). ■

State of Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign!

Prison Phone Justice Project needs your help for statewide campaign!

While much progress has been made in reducing the costs of long distance prison calls, we are still fighting to reduce the high costs of in-state prison and jail calls at the local level. In January 2014, the Human Rights Defense Center (HRDC), the parent organization of Prison Legal News, reopened its Seattle office to launch the Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign.

This is our first statewide phone justice campaign, and we're excited to have people involved on both the local and national levels who are dedicated to ending the exorbitant phone rates and kickbacks associated with the prison phone industry. David Ganim, HRDC's national Prison Phone Justice Director, has already been obtaining the phone contracts and rates for all 39 county jails in Washington, as well as data from the Washington Department of Corrections.

We recently hired a local campaign director, Carrie Wilkinson, who will manage our office in Seattle and coordinate the statewide campaign. Washington prisoners and their families pay some of the highest phone rates in the nation, and we need your help to win this battle!

Here's how you can help – first, please visit the Washington campaign website:

There you can see all the ways you can make a difference. The site allows you to sign up for the campaign and upload videos and share blog entries about how high prison phone rates make it difficult for you to stay in touch with your incarcerated loved ones. You can also upload an audio message, and even call in your story to 1-877-410-4863, toll-free 24 hours a day, seven days a week! We need to hear how you and your family have been affected by high prison phone rates. If you don't have Internet access, you can mail us a letter describing your experiences and we'll post it. Send letters to HRDC's main office at: HRDC, Attn: WA Phone Justice Campaign, P.O. Box 1151, Lake Worth, FL 33460. Washington state prisoners can mail us letters and send a copy of this notice to their family members so they can get involved.

By choosing to participate in the Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign, you will be playing a key role in ending the unfair phone rates that prisoners' families have to pay. We cannot win this battle without your help, so please visit the campaign website and share your experiences! Donations are also welcome and greatly appreciated, and can be mailed to the above address or made online via the campaign site. Thank you for your support!

Study: TASER Shocks May Cause Fatal Heart Attacks

by Matt Clarke

A STUDY INVOLVING EIGHT PEOPLE WHO lost consciousness immediately after being shocked by a TASER X26 – the most common electronic control device (ECD) used by police, corrections agencies and the military – concluded that ECD shocks can induce fatal cardiac arrest by causing cardiac “capture” and ventricular tachycardia/ventricular fibrillation (VT/VF). Seven of the eight persons profiled in the study died while the eighth suffered memory impairment after receiving a near-fatal shock, according to an article published in Circulation, the journal of the American Heart Association.

The eight subjects of the peer-reviewed study were all male, ranging from 16 to 44 years old. Six were under the age of 25. All were struck in the chest with barbs from a TASER X26, a handgun-shaped weapon that fires the barbs with attached conductive wires using compressed nitrogen. The device delivers an initial 5,000-volt shock, followed by rapid micro-pulsing that is designed to mimic the electrical signals used by the brain to communicate with the muscles. The standard shock cycle lasts five seconds but can be shortened or repeated by the user.

The study found that a TASER shock “can cause cardiac electric capture and provoke cardiac arrest” resulting from an abnormal, rapid heart rate and uncontrolled, fluttering heart contractions. The journal article on the study’s findings was authored by Dr. Douglas Zipes, with the Krannert Institute of Cardiology at Indiana University.

Scottsdale, Arizona-based TASER International, Inc., which manufactures the ECD devices, strongly defended its products. Company spokesman Steve Tuttle noted that with only eight subjects in the study, “broader conclusions shouldn’t be drawn based on such a limited sample.”

“There have been 3 million uses of TASER devices worldwide, with this case series reporting eight of concern,” he added. “This article does not support a cause-effect association and fails to accurately evaluate the risks versus the benefits of the thousands of lives saved by police with TASER devices.”

The company’s website boasts that

TASERs have saved nearly 125,000 lives, and that “Every Day TASER CEWs [Conducted Electrical Weapons] are Used 904 Times, Saving a Life from Potential Death or Serious Injury Every 30 Minutes.” The site also quotes a Wake Forest University study which found that “in 1,201 cases, 99.75% [of] people subjected to a TASER CEW had no significant injuries.”

Research published by USA Today in May 2012 indicated that the use of TASERs by police has saved lives because officers are less likely to kill someone using a TASER than by shooting them. The research also found that TASERs reduced the number of injuries suffered by police officers when apprehending suspects.

Tuttle questioned whether Dr. Zipes might have possible bias because he had testified as an expert witness in lawsuits against TASER. “There are key facts that contradict the role of the TASER device in all of these cited cases, and Dr. Zipes has conveniently omitted all facts that contradict his opinion,” Tuttle said.

However, Amnesty International reported in February 2012 that more than 500 post-ECD-shock deaths occurred following TASER deployments between 2001 and 2008. Further, a report from a commission of inquiry into the death of a man at the Vancouver airport in Canada concluded there was evidence “that the electric current from a conducted energy weapon is capable of triggering ventricular capture ... and that the risk of ventricular fibrillation increases as the tips of the probes get closer to the walls of the heart.”

Other studies, including a 2011 report by the ACLU of Arizona, have also identified problems with the use of TASERs by law enforcement agencies. [See: PLN, April 2012, p.26]. Prior to Dr. Zipes’ research, though, no peer-reviewed study had concluded that ECD shocks can induce ventricular fibrillation leading to sudden cardiac arrest and death.

TASER published an eight-page warning in March 2013 that stated, “exposure in the chest area near the heart has a low probability of inducing extra heart beats (cardiac capture). In rare circumstances, cardiac capture could lead to cardiac arrest.

When possible, avoid targeting the frontal chest area near the heart to reduce the risk of potential serious injury or death.”

In November 2013, TASER submitted a statement to the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) indicating that the company would pay a total of $2.3 million in settlements in product liability lawsuits. The statement said the settlements were intended to end legal battles over TASER-related “suspect injury or death.”

TASER also changed the warning labels on its ECD products. The company used to tout TASERs as delivering “non-lethal” shocks, but following several TASER-related deaths the language was changed in 2009 to read “less lethal.” Company training manuals now state that “exposure in the chest area near the heart ... could lead to cardiac arrest.”

The eight subjects in the study authored by Dr. Zipes were all clinically healthy. They were hit with one or both TASER barbs in the anterior chest wall near the heart, and all lost consciousness during or immediately after being shocked. In six cases, the first recorded heart rhythms were VT/VF. One had no heart rhythm, and in the eighth subject an external defibrillator reported a shockable rhythm but did not record it.

Two of the subjects had structural heart disease, two had elevated blood alcohol levels and two had both. The study concluded, however, that those conditions were considered unlikely to be the cause of the sudden loss of consciousness that occurred at the time or immediately after they received TASER shocks, although the conditions may have increased the likelihood of ECD-induced VT/VF.

The study also concluded it was unlikely that other known causes of in-custody death, such as “excited delirium” or restraint asphyxia, were factors in the deaths of seven of the eight subjects due to the proximity of the TASER shock to the loss of consciousness.

Dr. Zipes’ research noted that studies in pigs, sheep and humans established that shocks across the chest from the TASER X26 and a new prototype ECD could cause cardiac capture. The pig studies also repeatedly showed that the TASER X26 could induce VT/VF at normal or higher-than-normal outputs. Similar studies attempting to induce VT/VF by placing the barbs in the anterior chest and using strong, multiple and/or lengthy shocks could not be conducted on humans due to ethical considerations.

Of course, such considerations do not prevent police officers from using TASERS on suspects, or prison and jail guards from deploying TASERS against prisoners. ■

Texas Court Holds CCA is a "Governmental Body" for Purposes of Public Records Law

ON MARCH 19, 2014, A STATE DISTRICT court in Travis County, Texas held that Corrections Corporation of America (CCA), the nation's largest for-profit prison company, is considered a "governmental body" for purposes of the state's Public Information Act and therefore subject to the Act's "obligations to disclose public information."

The court entered its ruling on a motion for summary judgment filed by Prison Legal News, which had brought suit against CCA in May 2013 after the company refused to produce records related to the now-closed Dawson State Jail in Dallas – including reports, investigations and audits regarding CCA's operation of the facility. [See: PLN, June 2013, p.46]. Such records would have been made public had the jail been operated by a government agency.

"This is one of the many failings of private prisons," said PLN managing editor Alex Friedmann. "By contracting with private companies, corrections officials interfere with the public's right to know what is happening in prisons and jails, even though the contracts are funded with taxpayer money. This lack of transparency contributes to abuses and misconduct by for-profit companies like CCA, which prefer secrecy over public accountability."

CCA currently operates nine facilities in Texas, including four that house state prisoners.

"The conditions of Texas prisons have been the focus of intense public scrutiny for nearly 40 years," stated Brian McGiverin, an attorney with the Texas Civil Rights Project. "Today's ruling is a victory for transparency and responsible government. Texans have a right to know what their government is doing, even when a private company is hired to do it."

In its summary judgment motion, PLN argued that CCA meets the definition of a governmental body under the state's Public Information Act, Section 552.003 of the Texas Government Code, because, among other factors, the company "shares a common purpose and objective to that of the government" and performs services "traditionally performed by governmental bodies."

In the latter regard, PLN noted that "Incarceration is inherently a power of government. By using public money to perform a public function, CCA is a governmental body for purposes" of the Public Information Act. CCA's argument to the contrary – that it is not a governmental body and therefore does not have to comply with public records requests – was rejected by the district court.

CCA had also argued that the taxpayer funds it receives from the State of Texas "are not necessarily used specifically for operating Texas facilities," and that such payments "are used generally to support CCA's corporate allocations throughout the United States."

PLN previously prevailed in a similar public records lawsuit against CCA in Tennessee, where the firm is headquartered; another records suit filed by PLN is pending against CCA in Vermont. The company has vigorously opposed lawsuits requiring it to comply with public records laws. [See: PLN, July 2013, p.42; June 2013, p.14].

"CCA and other private prison companies should not be able to hide behind closed corporate doors when they contract with government agencies to perform public services using taxpayer money," said PLN editor Paul Wright.

PLN was ably represented by attorneys Cindy Saiter Connolly with Scott, Douglass & McConico, LLP and Brian McGiverin with the Texas Civil Rights Project. See: Prison Legal News v. CCA, Travis County District Court (TX), Cause No. D-1-GN-13-001445. ■

Mass Incarceration: The Whole Pie

A Prison Policy Initiative briefing

by Peter Wagner and Leah Sakala

WAIT, DOES THE UNITED STATES HAVE 1.4 million or more than 2 million people in prison? And do the 688,000 people released every year include those getting out of local jails? Frustrating questions like these abound because our systems of federal, state, local and other types of confinement – and the data collectors that keep track of them – are so fragmented. There is a lot of interesting and valuable research out there, but definitional issues and incompatibilities make it hard to get the big picture for both people new to criminal justice and for experienced policy wonks.

On the other hand, piecing together the available information offers some clarity. This briefing presents the first graphic we're aware of that aggregates the disparate systems of confinement in this country, which hold more than 2.4 million people in 1,719 state prisons, 102 federal prisons, 2,259 juvenile correctional facilities, 3,283 local jails and 79 Indian Country jails as well as in military prisons, immigration detention facilities, civil commitment centers and prisons in U.S. territories.<sup>1</sup>

While the numbers in each slice of this pie chart represent a snapshot cross section of our correctional system, the enormous churn in and out of confinement facilities underscores how naive it is to conceive of prisons as separate from the rest of our society. In addition to the 688,000 people released from prisons each year,<sup>2</sup> almost 12 million people cycle through local jails annually.<sup>3</sup> Jail churn is particularly high because at any given moment most of the 722,000 people in local jails have not been convicted and are incarcerated because they are either too poor to make bail and are being held before trial, or because they've just been arrested and will make bail in the next few hours or days. The remainder of the people in jail – almost 300,000 – are serving time for minor offenses, generally misdemeanors with sentences under a year.

So now that we have a sense of the bigger picture, a natural follow-up question might be something like: how many people are locked up in any kind of facility for a drug offense? While the data don't give us a complete answer, we do know that it's 237,000 people in state prison, 95,000 in federal prison and 5,000 in juvenile facilities, plus some unknowable portion of the population confined in military prisons, territorial prisons and local jails.

Offense figures for categories such as “drugs” carry an important caveat here, however: all cases are reported only under the most serious offense. For example, a person who is serving prison time for both murder and a drug offense would be reported only in the murder portion of the chart. This methodology exposes some disturbing facts, particularly about our juvenile justice system. For example, there are nearly 15,000 children behind bars whose “most serious offense” wasn't anything that most people would consider a crime. Almost 12,000 children are behind bars for “technical violations” of the requirements of their probation or parole, rather than for a new criminal offense, and more than 3,000 children are behind bars for “status” offenses, which are, as the U.S. Department of Justice explains, “behaviors that are not law violations for adults, such as running away, truancy, and incorrigibility.”<sup>4</sup>

Turning finally to the people who are locked up because of immigration-related issues, more than 22,000 are in federal prison for criminal convictions of violating federal immigration laws. A separate 34,000 are technically not in the criminal justice system but rather are detained by U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE), undergoing the process of deportation, and are physically confined in immigration detention facilities or in one of hundreds of individual jails that contract with ICE.<sup>5</sup> (Notably, those two categories do not include the people represented in other pie slices who are in some early stage of the deportation process due to non-immigration-related criminal convictions).

Now that we can, for the first time, see the big picture of how many people are locked up in the United States in the various types of facilities, we can see that something needs to change. Looking at the big picture requires us to ask if it really makes sense to imprison 2.4 million people on any given day, giving us the dubious distinction of having the highest incarceration rate in the world. Both policy makers and the public have the responsibility to carefully consider each individual slice of the pie chart in turn, to ask whether legitimate social goals are served by putting each category behind bars and whether any benefit really outweighs the social and fiscal costs. We're optimistic that this whole-pie approach<sup>6</sup> can give Americans, who seem increasingly ready for a fresh look at the criminal justice system, some of the tools they need to demand meaningful changes to how we do justice.

Several data definitions and clarifications may be helpful to researchers reusing this data in new ways:

- The state prison offense category of “public order” includes weapons, drunk driving, court offenses, commercialized vice, morals and decency offenses, liquor law violations and other public-order offenses.

- The state prison “other” category includes offenses labeled “other/unspecified” (7,900), manslaughter (21,500), rape (70,200), “other sexual assault” (90,600), “other violent” (43,400), larceny (45,900), motor vehicle theft (15,000), fraud (30,800) and “other property” (27,700).

- The federal prison “other” category includes people who have not been convicted or are serving sentences of under 1 year (19,312), homicide (2,800), robbery (8,100), “other violent” (4,000), burglary (400), fraud (7,700), “other property” (2,500), “other public order offenses” (17,100) and a remaining 7,850 records that could not be put into specific offense types because the “2011 data included individuals committing drug and public-order crimes that could not be separated from valid unspecified records.”

- The juvenile prison “other” category includes criminal homicide (924), sexual assault (4,638), simple assault (5,445), “other person” (1,910), theft (3,759), auto theft (2,469), arson (533), “other property” (3,029), weapons (3,013) and “other public order” (5,126).

- To minimize the risk of anyone in immigration detention being counted twice, we removed the 22,870 people – cited in Table 8 of Jail Inmates at Midyear 2012 – confined in local jails under contract with ICE from the total jail population and from the numbers we calculated for those in local jails that have not been convicted. (Table 3 reports the percentage of the jail population that is convicted (60.6%) and unconvicted (39.4%), with the latter category also including immigration detainees held in local jails).

- At least 17 states and the federal government operate facilities for the purposes of detaining people convicted of sexual crimes after their sentences are complete. These facilities and the confinement there are technically civil, but in reality are quite like prisons. They are often run by state prison systems, are often located on prison grounds and, most importantly, the people confined there are not allowed to leave.

1 The number of state and federal facilities is from Census of State and Federal Correctional Facilities, 2005; the number of juvenile facilities from Census of Juveniles in Residential Placement, 2010; the number of jails from Census of Jail Facilities, 2006 and the number of Indian Country jails from Jails in Indian Country, 2012. We aren't currently aware of a good source of data on the number of the other types of facilities.

2 U.S. Department of Justice, Prisoners in 2011, page 1, reporting that 688,384 people were released from state and federal prisons in 2011. [Ed. note – the number of releases dropped to 637,400 in 2012]

5 Of all of the confinement systems discussed in this report, the immigration system is the most fragmented and the hardest to get comprehensive data on. 6 It is important to remember that the correctional system pie is far larger than just prisons and includes another 3,981,090 adults on probation and 851,662 adults on parole. See Bureau of Justice Statistics, Probation and Parole in the United States, 2012, Appendix Tables 2 and 4.

New York Prisoner Secures Court Order for Visitation with Child

THE NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS upheld a lower court's ruling that granted an incarcerated father visitation rights with his three-year-old child. The Court held the lower court had properly applied a legal standard that presumes in favor of visitation and considers whether that presumption is rebutted by evidence showing visits would be harmful to the child.

The petitioner, New York state prisoner Shawn G. Granger, acknowledged paternity of a child prior to his imprisonment. He sought an order under the Family Court Act allowing visitation after the mother refused to bring the child to see him in prison.

The family court noted that state law presumes a child's best interest is served by visits with a non-custodial parent, and “the fact that such parent is incarcerated is not an automatic reason for blocking visitation.” The court found that Granger had been involved in the child's life prior to incarceration and had acted to maintain the relationship after he went to prison. Further, the court determined the child would not be harmed by travel to the prison and thus ordered periodic four-hour visits. The Appellate Division affirmed.

The Court of Appeals rejected the mother's argument that the family court had applied the wrong standard of law. It reaffirmed that “substantial proof” must be presented to overcome the presumption in favor of visitation, including when a parent is incarcerated. Visits should be denied to a non-custodial parent upon a showing they would be harmful to the child, which was not demonstrated in this case.

The Court declined to consider the impact of Granger's subsequent transfer to a more distant facility, as that issue should have been the subject of a modification petition and not presented as an issue of first impression on appeal. The lower court's order was affirmed. See: Matter of Granger v. Misercola, 21 N.Y.3d 86, 990 N.E.2d 110 (N.Y. 2013). ■

States Renewing Their Prison Phone Contracts

As state DOCs renew or rebid their prison phone contracts, you can help urge them to eliminate commission kickbacks and lower intrastate phone rates.

The Campaign for Prison Phone Justice needs your help in ***** Kentucky, Alaska and Georgia! *******

The Departments of Corrections in the above states are in the process of re-bidding or renewing their prison phone contracts. Most DOCs receive a commission (kickback) on revenue generated from calls made by prisoners, which results in excessively high phone rates. Although the FCC voted last year to cap the costs of interstate (long distance) prison calls, which went into effect on February 11, 2014, the order does not apply to intrastate (in-state) calls; an estimated 85% of prison phone calls are in-state. This is an opportunity to ask DOCs to forgo commissions and ensure their new prison phone contracts are based on the lowest cost to those who pay for the calls – mostly prisoners' families.

Take Action NOW! Here's What YOU Can Do!

Ask your family members and friends to write, email, call and fax the DOC and the governor's office (addresses and contacts are listed below), requesting that the DOC: 1) forgo commission payments when re-bidding or renewing its prison phone contract, and 2) base the new contract on the lowest calling cost. Lower prison phone rates should apply not just to long distance calls but also to in-state calls. For a sample letter or to easily send an email, visit the Campaign for Prison Phone Justice's website and click on the "Take Action" tab:

Placing Rival Gang Members in Same Cell Not Per Se Unconstitutional

THE NINTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS applied the harmless error test in finding that a district court's late Rand summary judgment notice did not deprive a prisoner of substantial rights. Additionally, the appellate court held prison officials were not deliberately indifferent to a substantial risk of violence by placing two rival gang members in the same cell.

This case involved the appeal of a Hawaii federal district court's grant of summary judgment to Corrections Corporation of America and CCA guards at the Saguaro Correctional Center (SCC) in Arizona. The suit was brought by Hawaii state prisoner Keone Labatad, who was housed at SCC and assaulted by another prisoner on July 23, 2009.

Three days earlier, Labatad, a member of the La Familia gang, got into a fight with Howard Giddeons, a member of the USO Family gang. Both told guards that the fight was not gang-related and they had shook hands afterwards. Following procedure, both were placed in administrative segregation.

Labatad was put in a cell with Shane Mara, a USO Family gang member. On the day of the assault, Mara waited until Labatad was in hand restraints in preparation for leaving the cell; he then hit Labatad in the head and back, causing a welt and a bloody nose.

Labatad filed a civil rights action alleging his Eighth Amendment rights were violated by a general policy at SCC that allowed rival gang members to be housed in the same cell, as well as the specific decision to place him in a cell with Mara. He sought damages and injunctive relief, and the defendants moved for summary judgment.

The day after Labatad filed a detailed response to the motion, the district court sent him the summary judgment notice required under Rand v. Rowland, 154 F.3d 952 (9th Cir. 1998) [PLN, April 1999, p.19]. The purpose of the Rand notice is to provide a pro se prisoner litigant "fair notice" of his "rights and obligations under Rule 56," his "right to file counter-affidavits or other responsive evidentiary materials and be alerted to the fact that failure to do so might result in the entry of summary judgment against" him, and "the effect of losing on summary judgment." The court granted the defendants' motion and Labatad appealed.

The Ninth Circuit held the district court's delay in sending the Rand notice was error, but held this was "one of the unusual cases" where the error was harmless because "the record, viewed objectively, shows that Labatad knew and understood the information in the Rand notice before he received it."

The district court found that SCC's policy of permitting members of different gangs to be housed together in the same cell was not itself an Eighth Amendment violation. At oral argument, Labatad clarified he was not asserting a per se constitutional violation; instead, he was alleging the defendants were deliberately indifferent to the risk of harm resulting from his cell assignment with Mara, a rival gang member.

Viewing the record objectively and subjectively, the Ninth Circuit found the evidence was insufficient to preclude summary judgment on that claim. Mara and Labatad had been in general population for an extended period of time without threats or problems between them, they were not listed as "separatees," and prison officials had been assured the fight between Labatad and Giddeons was resolved and not gang-related. In sum, there were no facts to suggest that Labatad was at substantial risk of harm when he was housed with Mara.

The district court's order granting summary judgment to the defendants was affirmed. See: Labatad v. CCA, 714 F.3d 1155 (9th Cir. 2013). ■

GPS Monitoring System in Los Angeles Plagued by False Alerts, Ignored Alarms

by Christopher Zoukis

LOS ANGELES COUNTY'S GPS MONITORING system, designed to keep track of high-risk probationers, has overwhelmed probation officers with thousands of false alerts each day – so many that some officers simply ignore them. As a result, dozens of probationers have been able to roam unmonitored. In some cases, even when probationers removed their monitoring devices, the removal was not discovered for lengthy periods of time.

GPS monitors are used to track the highest-risk probationers and parolees, including sex offenders. A massive shift of prisoners from state prisons to county jails under California's "realignment" legislation has led some counties to release hundreds of low-level offenders on electronic monitoring as a way to cut costs and reduce jail overcrowding.

The GPS system in Los Angeles County picks up satellite signals and transmits the data over cellular networks to a central computer. The system is designed to send an alert to a probation officer under a variety of circumstances; for example, if a probationer tries to remove the monitor or enter a designated prohibited area, or if the GPS batteries run down. The GPS devices send alerts for a number of routine reasons, too, such as when the signal is blocked by a building or if the monitor has a loose strap or damaged case.

According to probation officers, there is no easy way to distinguish the cause of the alert. Thus, a prolonged lost monitoring signal might mean the probationer has absconded or simply that the signal is being blocked due to a building's structure.

County officials say they have been "overwhelmed" with thousands of alarms each day. Most are relatively meaningless, for low battery warnings or blocked signals, and are ignored or deleted by probation officers. Others are more serious; 80 probationers removed their GPS devices in 2013, and in one case an offender went unmonitored for 45 days.

"If a person's not being properly monitored or supervised, then what's going to stop them from taking it off and leaving?" asked Dwight Thompson, a representative for the union that represents Los Angeles County probation officers. "If they take it off, what was the point of putting it on?"

A field test in 2011 found that GPS devices used to monitor California sex offenders transmitted no signal 55 percent of the time, and PLN previously reported that thousands of sex offenders in the state had removed their GPS monitors or committed monitoring violations, as there were few repercussions for doing so. [See: PLN, April 2013, p.18].

A November 13, 2013 corrective action notice sent by the Los Angeles County Probation Department to Sentinel Offender Services, the company that provides the county's GPS system, indicated that one in four GPS devices were faulty—they generated too many false alarms or had defective batteries. Sentinel blamed poorly-trained probation officers and probationers who didn't follow instructions for properly charging their GPS monitors. [See: PLN, Jan. 2014, p.18]. The company has increased training and replaced the monitors with more recent models.

Private companies that provide GPS monitoring services may be more interested in generating profit than ensuring public safety—one of several concerns related to the increased use of electronic monitoring. [See: PLN, March 2012, p.20].

While faulty equipment doesn't help matters, Los Angeles County also has the GPS system set up to send an email alert to a probation officer when a probationer passes through, or travels close to, a prohibited area—such as when sex offenders are near schools or parks. There are some 4,900 prohibited areas in the county, about one every square mile. This makes it almost impossible for a probationer to go anywhere without triggering alerts, and thousands of those alarms are generated each month.

"Just riding the Red Line [public transportation] would set off 10 alerts, passing schools on the way," noted John Tuckek, a vice-president for the Association of Probation Supervisors who also works as a probation officer. "If we keep getting false positives, we're not going to know the real ones that mean danger."

"When these alerts are in the tens of thousands, it seems like an unwinnable situation," said

Matthew DeMichele, a former researcher for the American Probation and Parole Association, and coauthor of the Justice Department's guide on electronic monitoring. GPS monitoring systems simply don't provide the level of accountability and security that they claim, he added: "In some ways, GPS vendors are selling law enforcement agencies, politicians, the public a false bag of goods." ■

No Death Penalty for Maine Prisoner

by Lance Tapley

IN 2008, WITHIN A SUPPOSEDLY HIGH-security prison in the giant federal correctional complex in Florence, Colorado, Gary Watland, a “boarder” from Maine, murdered another prisoner, white supremacist Mark Baker.

After five and a half years – and after, probably, millions in taxpayer-paid legal costs, including for his defense team – Watland, the only Maine prisoner facing a possible death penalty, saw federal prosecutors in Denver on February 5, 2014 accept his offer to spend life behind bars without the possibility of parole.

However, Watland, 51, already had accumulated enough time to spend life in prison. He had been placed in the federal system after being sentenced to 35 years for a 2006 escape attempt at the Maine State Prison, in Warren, where he was serving 25 years for killing a drinking buddy in 2004.

At Warren, Watland had plotted with his wife to have her smuggle a gun behind her belt buckle into the prison visitors’ room, where he allegedly planned to kill guards and anyone else in his way during the breakout. After a prisoner tipped off authorities, Susan Watland was apprehended with the loaded gun in the parking lot.

In Colorado, Watland snuck up on Baker while he was playing poker and stabbed him in the neck with a homemade knife. The plea agreement states: “One blow was to the carotid artery and a second blow severed the brain stem. Mr. Baker fell to the floor dead.” Watland maintained he was in a “kill or be killed” situation. Baker’s prison gang, the Nazi Low Riders, was allegedly harassing gays. Defending his life, Watland came out of the closet.

The feds had wanted to use the arguments that Watland was still dangerous and had a low chance of rehabilitation to obtain a death sentence from a jury, but a judge ruled them out. Shortly after the ruling, prosecutors accepted the plea bargain.

Watland’s case recently stimulated the Maine Prisoner Advocacy Coalition to urge the state Department of Corrections to ban sending Maine prisoners to jurisdictions with the death penalty. Maine doesn’t have capital punishment; the federal government does.

“He’s a classic example of why the death penalty shouldn’t be used,” commented a prisoner who knew him at Warren. “I believe that Gary Watland is mentally ill.” In 2007 his mother told The Portland Phoenix he suffered from bipolar disorder. He denies any mental illness.

Originally from California, Watland re-established his relationship with his parents and teenage daughter during his years awaiting trial in the solitary-confinement ADX prison, which also is in the federal complex in Florence.

“He’s grown as a person over the time I’ve known him,” defense attorney Patrick Burke told the Phoenix. “I think he’ll continue to make a contribution to his family and friends.”

Any future contribution Watland makes will likely be from the austere isolation of the most dreaded supermax in America. Although the U.S. Bureau of Prisons will decide where Watland will be kept, expectations are he will continue to be held at ADX. If he were allowed into a prison’s general population, he would risk being killed in gang revenge. ■

Qualified Immunity Denied to Michigan Guard for Improper Strip Search of Amputee Prisoner

THE SIXTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS affirmed the denial of qualified immunity to a Michigan prison guard who allegedly strip searched a prisoner without a legitimate penological reason for doing so. The appellate court also vacated the denial of qualified immunity to a warden who sanctioned the prisoner’s placement in isolation, remanding for consideration of the warden’s qualified immunity defense.

When Martinique Stoudemire entered Michigan’s prison system at the age of 23 in July 2002, she had a lengthy documented history of health problems. Absent proper care, she was at significant risk of experiencing kidney and liver damage, heart attacks, amputations and chronic pain. After arriving at the Huron Valley Women’s Correctional Facility (Huron), her health quickly deteriorated.

By the time she was paroled in 2007, Stoudemire had undergone three amputations, eventually losing both legs below the knee. She attributed her health complications to the failure of prison staff, nurses and associated doctors to provide adequate medical care. The appeal in her lawsuit focused on her final amputation in December 2007, when she contracted a MRSA infection and was quarantined in Huron’s segregation unit. [See: PLN, May 2007, p.1].

Michigan Department of Corrections

(MDOC) policy provides for prisoners with MRSA to be quarantined, and the warden at Huron, Susan Davis, designated the facility’s segregation unit as a quarantine location. Pursuant to that policy, Stoudemire spent two weeks in segregation.

While there she received “extremely poor” medical care: The cell was not equipped for disabled prisoners, and she was not provided with assistive devices to safely move between her bed, wheelchair, toilet and shower. Medical staff treated her with contempt, accused her of malingering and responded with hostility when she sought assistance. She was once forced to urinate in a bowl, defecated on herself once, received only one shower in the two weeks she spent in segregation and had to dress her own wounds.

Warden Davis argued that she was entitled to qualified immunity on Stoudemire’s claim that the segregation conditions amounted to deliberate indifference to her serious medical needs. The Sixth Circuit found the district court did not make factual findings pertaining to Davis or her mental state or knowledge of the facts alleged by Stoudemire, and remanded that issue to the lower court to make such findings and rule on Davis’ qualified immunity defense.

The Court of Appeals then addressed a claim against prison guard Ariel N. Dugan, who strip searched Stoudemire on February 10, 2007. An MDOC reprimand noted that “other persons could have observed” Stoudemire during the strip search because Dunagan failed to block a window in the cell door, and Dunagan admitted that such “visual contact” was possible.

Stoudemire alleged the search was “undertaken to harass or humiliate” her. The appellate court wrote that prisoners have a diminished right to be secure in their persons against unreasonable searches, but “a strip search is a particularly extreme invasion of that right.” The Sixth Circuit said such searches require exigent circumstances.

Three facts, the Court of Appeals found, indicated that the search was invasive. First, the location allowed people in the hall outside Stoudemire’s cell to view the search. Next, Dunagan refused to tell Stoudemire the reasons for the strip search. Dunagan also smirked during the search, which may suggest “personal animus and implicate the dignitary interest ‘inherent in the privacy component of the Fourth Amendment’s proscription against unreasonable searches.’”

The Court emphasized it was not reviewing MDOC policy, but rather considering the acts of a guard who violated that policy and was sued in her individual capacity. It found the right at issue was clearly established, precluding qualified immunity. The district court’s order was vacated in part, affirmed in part, and remanded for a determination of Warden Davis’ qualified immunity defense and of Davis and Dunagan’s immunity defense to Stoudemire’s state law claims. See: Stoudemire v. Michigan Dept. of Corrections, 705 F.3d 560 (6th Cir. 2013).

Following remand, on September 25, 2013 the district court granted Stoudemire’s motion to reopen the record to obtain “new evidence in opposition to the MDOC Defendants’ motion to dismiss and for summary judgment.” The case remains pending. ■

The detailed table of contents – 24 pages, not included in the 510 page count – is thoroughly indexed to help locate answers to your questions without time-consuming searches.

The Redbook is much more than a reference tool, though. Its bold-faced head notes draw your eye quickly to important subjects. Short tutorial paragraphs follow, educating you about each sub-category within a given topic. This tutorial design provides a superb self-instruction course on English language writing, independent of its focus on legal writing. This text is recommended as the single reference book (beyond a dictionary or thesaurus) necessary for any serious incarcerated writer.

Have you ever stopped to ponder whether you’re inaptly (or ineptly) using an incorrect word? Is it “insidious” or “invidious”? Did you mean “insoluble” or “insolvable”? The Redbook expends an impressive 100 pages reviewing troublesome words that we all stumble over – offering refreshing distinctions among choices with concise explanations of their differences. If you are not sure where to begin to find a word that’s troubling you, a separate index includes 3,600 such words with page number references.

For jailhouse lawyers, the 55-page chapter on appellate briefs will prove useful in creating an effective presentation style beyond the legal points of your argument. Separate chapters guide you through pleadings and motions; additional chapters cover business letters and contracts. Each of the eleven chapters in Part 3 of the manual, “Preparing Legal Documents,” contains printed examples that depict format and style as well as content.

The Redbook is an invaluable (i.e., “priceless” versus merely “valuable”) reference and educational tool for people who want to prepare legal documents and concurrently improve their English language writing skills.

The 3rd edition of the Redbook was published in August 2013 and is priced around $45.00. Both editions are available from online booksellers such as Amazon, Alibris and Barnes & Noble. Note that the spiral binding of this book (2nd and 3rd editions) is made of metal wire, which may not be allowed in some prisons and jails. If removed, the wire can be easily replaced with a shoelace. ■

Court Awards $802,176 in Fees, Costs in PLN Censorship Suit Against Oregon County

IN MARCH 2014, A U.S. DISTRICT COURT ordered Columbia County, Oregon to pay $763,803.45 in attorney's fees and $38,373.01 in costs in a lawsuit raising claims of illegal censorship at the Columbia County Jail.

Prison Legal News had filed suit against Columbia County and Sheriff Jeff Dickerson in January 2012 after jail employees rejected PLN's monthly publication and letters mailed to prisoners at the facility. Further, the jail refused to provide notice or an opportunity to appeal the censorship of PLN's correspondence. [See: PLN, March 2013, p.50].

The Columbia County Jail rejected PLN's publication and letters pursuant to a policy that only allowed prisoners to send and receive mail in the form of postcards. Further, the jail did not allow magazines. In April 2013, following a bench trial, the district court entered judgment for PLN and prohibited enforcement of the policy – the first time that a jail's postcard-only policy has been struck down as unconstitutional following a trial on the merits. [See: PLN, June 2013, p.42].

During the litigation, the county admitted “that inmates have a First Amendment right to receive magazines and inmates and their correspondents have a Fourteenth Amendment right to procedural due process.” However, the jail defended its postcard-only policy and claimed there was no official policy banning magazines at the facility.

Following the trial, the district court found that the defendants' purported reasons for adopting the postcard-only policy – preventing the introduction of contraband and saving time during mail inspection – were not supported by the evidence. Columbia County subsequently agreed to pay $15,000 to resolve PLN's claim for monetary damages.

In its March 24, 2014 order awarding $802,176.46 in attorney's fees and costs to PLN, the district court rejected the county's arguments and objections to the award.

Jesse Wing, lead counsel for PLN, praised the court for recognizing that the case had advanced the public interest and the rights of many other people. “In his ruling today, Judge Michael H. Simon remarked that, ‘This action brought specific injunctive relief not only to PLN but also to all inmates at the Jail and their family and friends and others who wish to correspond with them...,’” Wing noted.

“The court's award of over $802,000 in attorney's fees and expenses in this case represents the cost of failing to comply with the Constitution of the United States,” said PLN editor Paul Wright. “When county officials willingly violate the Constitution and refuse to remedy those violations, instead choosing to engage in protracted litigation, ultimately there is a greater cost to the taxpayers.”

Columbia County has appealed the district court's judgment and injunction prohibiting enforcement of the jail's postcard-only policy, and the appeal remains pending before the Ninth Circuit.

PLN was ably represented by Jesse Wing and Katie Chamberlain with the Seattle law firm of MacDonald Hoague & Bayless; by the late Marc D. Blackman with the Portland law firm of Ransom Blackman, LLP, who passed away on January 1, 2014; and by Human Rights Defense Center general counsel Lance Weber. See: Prison Legal News v. Columbia County, U.S.D.C. (D. Ore.), Case No. 3:12-cv-00071-SI. ■

Oregon Appellate Court Declines to Correct Unpreserved Sentencing Error Related to Restitution

by Mark Wilson

IN MAY 2013, THE OREGON COURT OF Appeals agreed that a trial court had committed plain error when it recommended that a defendant pay restitution in an amount to be determined by the Board of Parole and Post-Prison Supervision (Board). The appellate court refused to correct the error, however, because the defendant did not object before the trial court.

Ramon E. Coronado was convicted of three assault charges. At a January 25, 2010 sentencing hearing on two of the convictions, the state requested restitution of $5,931.79 to the victim and $38,676.90 to the victim's insurance company. Coronado's attorney said “No objection.” During sentencing on the remaining conviction the following month, the court stated, “I'm going to recommend ... that [defendant] make restitution to the victim in this case in an amount to be determined by the [Board].”

Despite having failed to object to the second restitution order, Coronado argued that the Court of Appeals should exercise its discretion to review the order as plain error under Oregon Rule of Appellate Procedure 5.45(1).

The appellate court recognized that Coronado “correctly points out – and the state concedes – that no statute authorizes the court to recommend that [the Board] determine the amount of restitution.”

The Court of Appeals declined to correct the error, however, finding that Coronado had failed to object before the trial court, which would have made this “an easy error for the court to fix.” That is, if he “had brought it to the court's attention, the court could have imposed the restitution instead of recommending [the Board] do so. Now, defendant asks this court not to remand to correct the error, but to strike the portion of the judgment relating to restitution.” The appellate court refused to do so, as “that could result in a windfall” for Coronado by vacating any restitution as to his third assault charge. See: State v. Coronado, 256 Ore. App. 780, 302 P.3d 477 (Or. Ct. App. 2013).

However, the Court of Appeals' refusal to correct the error may still result in a “windfall” for Coronado, given that the Board only has the power bestowed upon it by the legislature. As that authority does not include the power to impose restitution in criminal cases, any order from the Board purporting to do so presumably would be ultra vires and thus invalid. ■

New York Prison Officials Can Force-Feed Hunger Striking Prisoner

THE NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS, the state's highest court, held that a hunger striking prisoner's rights were not violated by a judicial order allowing the state to feed him by nasogastric tube to preserve his life.

The Court's decision labeled New York state prisoner Leroy Dorsey a "serial hunger striker." Indeed, Dorsey went on a hunger strike three times in 2010, in an effort to obtain a transfer to another facility and bring attention to his claims of abuse and mistreatment.

Dorsey began one of the hunger strikes in October 2010; a month later he had lost 11.6% of his body weight. The New York Department of Corrections and Community Supervision (DOCCS) sought an order to insert a nasogastric tube and take other steps to hydrate him.

At a hearing on the petition, the DOCCS submitted testimony indicating that Dorsey was at imminent risk of starving to death or experiencing "a fatal cardiac arrhythmia due to electrolyte and fluid imbalance." Dorsey opposed the petition, arguing he was not suicidal and the DOCCS had no authority to interfere with his hunger strike protest.

The Supreme Court granted the DOCCS' petition. Following that decision, Dorsey voluntarily consumed a nutritional supplement and ate solid food. The Appellate Division deemed Dorsey's appeal moot but still ruled on the merits with respect to one issue, holding that when "an inmate's refusal to eat has placed that inmate at risk of serious injury and death ... the State's interest in protecting the health and welfare of persons in its custody outweighs an individual inmate's right to make personal choices about what nourishment to accept."

The Court of Appeals applied the four-part test set forth in Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78 (1987). It agreed the state has a significant interest in preserving life and preventing suicidal acts, and had been found liable in the past for failing to do so. The Court also noted a hunger strike can have a "significant destabilizing impact" on a prison. Further, other means were available for Dorsey to protest his treatment, such as grievances or litigation, and the Court distinguished previous cases in which it held that a competent adult may refuse medical treatment.

"In some circumstances we do not doubt that the right to refuse medical treatment is a prerogative that is compatible with incarceration," the Court of Appeals wrote. "But, even if we assume that some permutation of that right was implicated here, its invocation as part of a strategy to strong-arm DOCCS into granting a privilege to which Dorsey was not otherwise entitled is obviously not."

Accordingly, the lower courts' orders were affirmed. See: Matter of Bezio v. Dorsey, 21 N.Y.3d 93, 989 N.E.2d 942 (N.Y. 2013). ■

Ninth Circuit: Delay in Providing Dental Care May Constitute Deliberate Indifference

IN AN UNPUBLISHED RULING, A NINTH Circuit Court of Appeals panel reversed in part a district court's grant of summary judgment to prison officials who, a prisoner alleged, were deliberately indifferent to his serious medical needs.

In 2008, Nevada prisoner Martinez Aytch filed numerous requests for dental treatment for a "rotten" tooth that was causing him "awful" and "unbearable" pain. Nearly six weeks after filing an informal grievance alerting prison officials to his submission of five medical "kites," Aytch received pain medication and antibiotics but still had not seen a dentist. His informal grievance was denied.

Aytch then filed a § 1983 complaint alleging that prison officials had been deliberately indifferent to his dental needs; he also alleged they were deliberately indifferent to his vision problems. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the prison officials, and Aytch appealed.

Noting that Aytch's vision problems had been addressed when he received eyeglasses, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the grant of summary judgment with respect to that issue.

Relying on precedent, however, such as Hunt v. Dental Dep't, 865 F.2d 198 (9th Cir. 1989), the appellate court held that Aytch had raised a triable issue as to whether or not the delay in providing dental care – when considered in light of the pain he had to endure as a result of that delay – constituted deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs.

The Court of Appeals noted that budgetary constraints do not absolve prison officials from liability for such indifference, and remanded the case to the district court for further proceedings. See: Aytch v. Sablica, 498 Fed.Appx. 703 (9th Cir. 2012) (unpublished).

Following remand, and after Aytch filed numerous motions related to discovery issues and his ability to access the prison law library and obtain legal copies, the case went to trial in November 2013. The jury found in favor of the defendants and Aytch filed a notice of appeal. In January 2014 the district court denied his motion for transcripts at the government's expense, as it would not certify that the appeal was not frivolous pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 753(f). Aytch litigated the case, including the trial, pro se. See: Aytch v. Sablica, U.S.D.C. (D. Nev.), Case No. 2:08-cv-01773-VCF-VCF.

On March 6, 2014, in another case involving a prisoner alleging inadequate dental care, the Ninth Circuit held in an en banc decision that prison officials sued for money damages may raise a defense of lack of available resources to justify the failure to provide adequate medical care. This is contrary to the appellate ruling in Aytch and other established precedent, and PLN will report the en banc decision in greater detail in a future issue. See: Peralta v. Dillard, 2014 U.S. App. LEXIS 4226 (9th Cir. 2014). ■

Burden-Shifting Jury Instruction Requires New Trial in Prisoner's Lawsuit

THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT COURT OF Appeals has ordered a new trial in a civil rights action that alleges a prisoner was subjected to improper strip searches to humiliate him, then was subjected to an "especially protracted, gratuitous and humiliating strip search" in retaliation for having filed grievances complaining about the earlier searches.

The Court of Appeals had previously reversed an Illinois district court's grant of judgment as a matter of law to the defendants. See: Mays v. Springborn, 575 F.3d 643 (7th Cir. 2009). Following remand, the case went to trial and the jury returned a verdict in favor of the defendants. The plaintiff, Tiberius Mays, formerly incarcerated at the Illinois state prison at Stateville, filed another appeal arguing that he was prejudiced by the instructions and special interrogatories submitted to the jury.

Mays' attorney had failed to object to the instructions and interrogatories. As such, the appellate court said it could reverse only if there was "plain error" – meaning error that was both indisputable and likely to have influenced the outcome of the case.

The appellate court found misleading an interrogatory related to an Eighth Amendment claim that asked the jury to state whether each defendant did or did not "have a valid penological reason for the group search conducted [in a specified month or on a specified date]." As the Seventh Circuit held in the previous reversal in this case, even if there was a valid penological reason for the strip searches, "the manner in which the searches were conducted must itself pass constitutional muster."

The evidence showed the group searches had gratuitously exposed the nudity of each prisoner being searched, and the guards conducted the searches while wearing dirty gloves in a freezing basement and uttering demeaning comments about the prisoners' genitals.

In instructing the jury on Mays' First Amendment claim, the district court placed the burden of proof regarding causation on the wrong party by requiring Mays to negate the possibility that the retaliatory strip searches would have occurred even if there had been no retaliatory motive.

The Court of Appeals held the jury should have been instructed that Mays had the burden of proving retaliation was the motivating factor for the strip search, but even if he presented such proof, the defendants could still prevail if they persuaded the jury that it was more likely than not that the strip search would have occurred even had there been no retaliatory motive.

The failure to give such an instruction was found to be plain error, and that error was compounded by the special interrogatories submitted to the jury by the district court, which asked four times whether retaliation was "the sole motivating factor" for the strip search. Therefore, the judgment was reversed and the case remanded for another trial. See: Mays v. Springborn, 719 F.3d 631 (7th Cir. 2013).

Mays obtained new counsel following remand and a jury trial has been scheduled for May 20, 2014. This civil rights action, initially filed in 2001, has been pending for 13 years. ■

Eighth Circuit: Federal Sentence Consecutive to Later-Imposed State Sentence

by Mark Wilson

ON JUNE 6, 2013, THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT Court of Appeals held that a prisoner was not entitled to credit toward his federal sentence for time already served on state charges.

In March 2007, Charles Lee Elwell was arrested in Iowa. A federal indictment was issued against him several days later; Elwell was transferred to federal custody and the state court stayed its prosecution until the federal charges were resolved.

Elwell pleaded guilty to the federal charges and was sentenced to 66 months in prison in November 2007. The district court did not address whether the federal sentence would run concurrent or consecutive to any yet-to-be-imposed state sentence, as permitted by Setser v. United States, 132 S.Ct. 1463 (2012). [See related article in this issue of PLN].

Elwell was then returned to Iowa's custody and sentenced to two concurrent five-year prison terms. The state court expressed its intent to impose the state sentence concurrent with the already-imposed federal sentence.

Later discovering that Elwell's state and federal sentences were not concurrent, however, the state court resentenced Elwell to time served on February 6, 2009. As a result, Elwell's state sentence ended that day and he was transferred to the federal prison system.

The Bureau of Prisons (BOP) subsequently denied Elwell's request for credit for time served toward his federal sentence and for a nunc pro tunc designation pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 3621. Elwell then filed a habeas corpus petition, which was denied by the district court.

On appeal, the Eighth Circuit first applied the primary jurisdiction doctrine, finding that Iowa, not the federal government, had primary jurisdiction of Elwell from March 2007 to February 6, 2009. "Pursuant to the doctrine of primary jurisdiction, service of a federal sentence generally commences when the United States takes primary jurisdiction and a prisoner is presented to serve his federal sentence, not when the United States merely takes physical custody of a prisoner who is subject to another sovereign's primary jurisdiction," the Court of Appeals wrote.

Under 18 U.S.C. § 3584(a), "multiple terms of imprisonment imposed at different times run consecutively unless the court orders that the terms are to run concurrently." As such, the appellate court found that "Elwell's federal sentence must run consecutive to his state sentence."

Given the express bar on double credit imposed by 18 U.S.C. § 3585(b), the Court of Appeals also rejected Elwell's challenge to the BOP's denial of federal credit for time served while he was in state custody between March 2007 and February 6, 2009.

Finally, the Eighth Circuit held the BOP did not abuse its discretion in denying Elwell's request for a nunc pro tunc designation of the various facilities where he was incarcerated prior to February 6, 2009 as the locations for serving his federal sentence under 18 U.S.C. § 3621. See: Elwell v. Fisher, 716 F.3d 477 (8th Cir. 2013). ■

Sexual Abuse by Oregon Jail Guard Nets Probation; Defense Attorney Blames Victim

A FORMER OREGON JAIL GUARD WAS SENTENCED to probation for sexually abusing a female prisoner after pleading guilty to a misdemeanor charge; his defense attorney blamed the incarcerated victim while the prosecutor defended the light sentence. The guard, Eddie James Miller, 60, was later accused of sexually harassing a co-worker.

As previously reported in PLN, Miller's 21-year career at the Inverness Jail in Portland, Oregon came to an end when he was accused of walking in on a 34-year-old female prisoner as she was using the bathroom in the jail's medical unit and forcing her to perform oral sex on him on January 9, 2012 [See: PLN, April 2012, p.1].

The distraught prisoner immediately reported the incident to detectives, according to Mike Schults, a chief deputy with the Multnomah County Sheriff's Office.

Authorities said the woman's DNA was found on Miller, and she testified before a grand jury. On February 29, 2012, Miller was indicted on charges of official misconduct in the first degree and custodial sexual misconduct in the first degree.

The latter offense is a felony when an Oregon corrections employee or contractor engages in sexual intercourse with a prisoner; all other sexual contact constitutes the misdemeanor offense of custodial sexual misconduct in the second degree. Prisoners are not subject to prosecution, and consent is not a defense due to the power imbalance between guards and prisoners.

Miller entered a not guilty plea through his attorney, Lisa Ludwig. He was fingerprinted, photographed and booked into jail but released on pretrial supervision pending trial.

"We take these things very seriously," said Schults. During the investigation, Miller was initially put on paid leave but later placed on unpaid leave following the indictment. He resigned in April 2012. Schults said the female prisoner was transferred to the nearby Washington County Jail for her safety.

Miller was allowed to plead guilty to a misdemeanor charge of official misconduct in the first degree and sentenced to two years' probation on September 25, 2012. Multnomah County Deputy District Attorney Don Rees defended the plea agreement by claiming that Miller may in fact have been the victim of a scheme to obtain a cash settlement from the county.

Noting that the prisoner has a 15-year criminal history, including fraud and forgery convictions, investigators said they became suspicious of her intentions when her boyfriend and another prisoner reported that she had told them she was using Miller to get rich off the county. Several prisoners at the Washington County Jail also informed officials that Miller told them of a plan to trap another guard in a similar scheme – as if jail guards are somehow unable to resist having sex with prisoners.

When Miller was sentenced, Ludwig called the victim a "con artist" but conceded that Miller was guilty of official misconduct. In addition to probation, Miller was ordered to pay a $2,500 compensatory fine to the victim and forfeit his law enforcement certification.

Meantime, Portland attorney Jennifer Palmquist notified the county of the prisoner's intent to file suit. She said Ludwig's reference to her client as a con artist was nothing more than "blaming the victim." Palmquist stated her client wants to fix a broken system, noting that jail staff did not offer her medical treatment or counseling when she reported the sexual abuse.

Meantime, after Miller was placed on leave, a former co-worker at the Inverness Jail came forward to report that he had kissed and touched her in a sexually aggressive, inappropriate and non-consensual manner.

In January 2013, the former co-worker, Shireela Kennedy, filed a $900,000 lawsuit against Miller, Multnomah County and Aramark Correctional Services, which contracts with the jail. The suit claimed that Miller began making inappropriate comments shortly after she began working at the facility in September 2011.

According to her lawsuit, Kennedy's supervisors destroyed a written sexual harassment complaint she had filed against Miller and ignored her numerous verbal complaints. The suit also alleged that Aramark employee Eddie Climer brushed off her reports of sexual harassment.

Kennedy said she began having panic attacks, depression and difficulty sleeping following Miller's inappropriate actions. She was terminated from her job in February 2012; since then, according to her complaint, she has suffered loss of earnings, job opportunities and other employment benefits.

Kennedy's lawsuit was resolved in October 2013 under undisclosed terms. See: Kennedy v. Aramark, Multnomah County Circuit Court (OR), Case No. 130101276. ■

Federal Court Must Give Reasons for Special Conditions of Supervised Release

by David Reutter

THE SIXTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS has reversed a district court's imposition of four special conditions of supervised release, due to the court's failure to explain its reasons for imposing them.

Rashan R. Doyle was convicted in New York of attempted sexual abuse in the first degree; as a result of that qualifying felony conviction, the Sex Offender Registration and Notification Act required him to register as a sex offender. When Doyle moved to Tennessee, however, he failed to register.

Doyle pleaded guilty to a charge of failure to register as a sex offender in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 2250(a). A federal district court in Tennessee sentenced him to 37 months in prison followed by ten years of supervised release, plus a $3,000 fine.

The term of supervised release included four special conditions that prohibited Doyle from possessing any pornography, even legal pornography; having direct or indirect contact with any child under eighteen, including loitering near school yards, playgrounds, swimming pools, arcades or other places frequented by children; using sexually-oriented telephone or computer-based services; and possessing or using a computer with access to any "on-line service" or other forms of wireless communication without the approval of his probation officer.

Because Doyle did not object to the special conditions at sentencing, the Sixth Circuit analyzed them under the plain-error standard. The appellate court held that "a district court errs if it fails, at the time of sentencing, to state in open court its rationale for mandating a special condition of supervised release." In this case, the district court had erred procedurally because it failed to explain its reasoning for the special conditions at issue; the Court of Appeals found the error was clear because the record did not show why the conditions were imposed.

Further, the district court's failure to explain its rationale for the special conditions "may have had a substantial influence on the outcome of the proceedings." The Sixth Circuit wrote, "there is a reasonable probability that the court may not have imposed the special conditions if it had fulfilled its obligations to explain the basis for the conditions or at least made sure the record illuminated the basis for the conditions." Finally, as the special conditions were "likely more severe than the ones the district court would have imposed had it fulfilled its obligation to explain its reasoning," the error was not harmless and affected the fairness, integrity or public reputation of the proceedings.

The four special conditions of Doyle's supervised release were vacated and the case remanded for resentencing. The district court was reminded that if it does impose special conditions, they "must be tailored to the specific case before the court." The Sixth Circuit noted that it did not see how some of the special conditions related to the nature and circumstance of Doyle's offense of failure to register; the one exception was contact with children or being in places where children congregate, but that provision should not apply to Doyle's own children. See: United States v. Doyle, 711 F.3d 729 (6th Cir. 2013).

Following remand, Doyle was resentenced on August 30, 2013 to 37 months in prison and five years of supervised release, plus a $3,000 fine. ■

Idaho Supreme Court Upholds Dismissal of § 1983 Claims in Jail Suicide Case

by Mark Wilson

THE IDAHO SUPREME COURT HAS AFFIRMED a lower court's dismissal of § 1983 claims stemming from the death of a detainee who committed suicide at the Ada County Jail (ACJ).

On September 28, 2008, Bradley Munroe was arrested for robbery. He was hospitalized because he was intoxicated, uncooperative and exhibiting odd behavior. Munroe claimed he would commit suicide if released, but the hospital cleared him and he was transported to ACJ.

During the booking process, Munroe was screaming, being rowdy and not making sense. Given his bizarre behavior, booking was suspended until the next morning and he was placed in a holding cell for observation.

James Johnson, a psychiatric social worker at the jail, assessed Munroe's suicide risk. Johnson concluded that Munroe's risk level was insufficient to justify admitting him to ACJ's Health Services Unit (HSU).

After Johnson's assessment, Munroe answered some suicide risk questions in the affirmative during the booking process. Guards did not contact staff in the HSU, however, based on Johnson's evaluation.

Upon his request, Munroe was held in a single cell in protective custody. Guards were required to conduct well-being checks every 30 minutes.

At around 9 a.m. on September 29,

2008, Munroe's mother, Rita Hoagland, called ACJ to express concerns that her son was suicidal. Hoagland's concerns were reported to Johnson, but he did not alter his initial assessment.

That evening, Munroe was found hanging by a bed sheet from the top bunk in his cell. Efforts to revive him were unsuccessful.

On January 23, 2009, Hoagland filed suit in state court, in her personal capacity and as the representative of Munroe's estate, claiming that guards were watching football when her son committed suicide. The initial complaint alleged § 1983 claims, state law torts and wrongful death claims.

When the defendants moved for summary judgment, Hoagland withdrew all of her state law claims and proceeded with only the § 1983 claims.

The trial court granted qualified immunity to Johnson and dismissed Hoagland's claims against the other defendants. It awarded $15,815.31 to the defendants in costs as a matter of right and $77,438.12 in discretionary costs, but not attorneys' fees.

On appeal, the Idaho Supreme Court found "the district court properly held that Munroe's estate is not a valid § 1983 plaintiff," because "Munroe's § 1983 claim abated with his death."

"This Court has clearly held that § 1983 is a personal cause of action. Furthermore, there is no federal law governing the issue of abatement. Therefore, the law of Idaho governs to the extent that it is not inconsistent with federal law. At common law in Idaho, a personal tort cause of action abates with the death of the plaintiff.”

The state Supreme Court also held that Hoagland had “failed to establish a violation of her constitutional rights underlying her § 1983 claim,” as she did not prove the defendants intentionally interfered with her relationship with Munroe.

Given Hoagland’s waiver of her state law wrongful death claim, the Court found that judicial estoppel barred her from asserting “that her § 1983 claim incorporates the wrongful death claim.”

The Supreme Court upheld the trial court’s denial of attorneys’ fees but reversed the discretionary award of costs to the defendants, noting that “the district court failed to make adequate findings.” On remand, the lower court was directed to reconsider the discretionary costs and make “express findings justifying the award.” The Court also reduced to $14,897.31 the costs awarded to the defendants as a matter of right. See: Hoagland v. Ada County, 154 Idaho 900, 303 P.3d 587 (Idaho 2013). ■

Washington PRA Violations Result in Costs and Penalties

by Mark Wilson

THE WASHINGTON COURT OF APPEALS, Division Two, held on July 30, 2013 that a state agency violated Washington’s Public Records Act (PRA) by failing to respond to a prisoner’s request within the statutory time limit and by redacting information not exempt from disclosure. The appellate court instructed the lower court to determine on remand the amount of costs and penalties to be awarded as a result of the violations.

On July 20, 2009, Monroe Correctional Complex prisoner Derek E. Gronquist sent a PRA request to the Washington State Department of Licensing (DOL) for the master business license application of a specified company.

The DOL failed to respond within five days in violation of the PRA. When the agency responded to Gronquist’s request on July 31, 2009, it provided the requested document but “redacted much of the application without providing a statutory basis for the redactions.”

Gronquist filed suit in state court, alleging that the DOL had violated the PRA by providing a redacted copy of the application. Following an inspection of the redacted information, the trial court granted summary judgment to the DOL, holding that the redacted material was not subject to disclosure but protected as confidential under Washington law.

The Court of Appeals reversed, holding that: 1) the DOL did not respond within the statutory time frame; 2) none of the redacted information was exempt when it was requested; 3) the DOL failed to provide timely or adequate justification for the redactions; and 4) the trial court improperly refused to file the deposition transcripts offered by Gronquist in support of his motion for sanctions and in response to the DOL’s summary judgment motion.

Due to a 2011 change that transferred the responsibility for master business licenses from the DOL to another state agency, the appellate court declined to order disclosure of the unredacted application requested by Gronquist. It remanded, however, instructing “the trial court to consider the imposition of costs and penalties after consideration of the entire record, including the depositions to be filed by the trial court.” Gronquist was also awarded his costs on appeal.

The Court of Appeals did not address the applicability of RCW § 42.56.565(1), effective July 22, 2011, which specifies that a court shall not award penalties for violations of the PRA “to a person who was serving a criminal sentence in a state, local, or privately operated correctional facility on the date the request for public records was made, unless the court finds that the agency acted in bad faith in denying the person the opportunity to inspect or copy a public record.” See: Gronquist v. Washington State Department of Licensing, 175 Wn. App. 729, 309 P.3d 538 (Wash. Ct. App. 2013). ■

Prisoner Organ Transplants, Donations Create Controversy

PRISON OFFICIALS IN SEVERAL STATES ARE mulling over two sides of the same coin with respect to organ transplants for prisoners: first, the eligibility and cost of such medical procedures, and second, whether prisoners should be allowed to donate their organs.

Prisoners in Need of Organ Transplants

IN RHODE ISLAND, A LIVER TRANSPLANT performed on a 27-year-old prisoner left officials defending the cost of the life-saving operation.

A spokeswoman for the Rhode Island Department of Corrections (RI DOC) said Jose Pacheco, who is serving a 6½-year sentence for robbery, became the first prisoner in the state to receive a liver transplant. The August 1, 2012 operation was performed in Boston because Rhode Island hospitals don't currently perform such transplants.

The procedure can cost up to almost $1 million, with the state required to pick up 40% of the bill, according to court precedent.

But the RI DOC said in a statement that it was unclear how much of Pacheco's hospital bills the state will actually pay because it's possible he qualified for Social Security benefits before he was incarcerated. In that case, Medicaid would cover about 50% of the cost.

"To date, the Department has paid only for the inmate's supervision in the hospital under an interagency agreement with the [Massachusetts Department of Corrections]," said RI DOC spokeswoman Tracey Zeckhausen. "That totaled just over $110,000" as of June 2012, she added.

"It is a sort of lose-lose situation for the taxpayer," said state Senator Dawson Hodgson. "It can amount to torture if you let someone die without healthcare. At the same time, $1 million is a tremendous amount of taxpayer resources, whether it is coming from the state or federal government, put into any person's healthcare – never mind someone who is a drug dealer and a thief."

Pacheco's case is not the first to generate controversy about prisoners receiving organ transplants, of course.

A California prisoner received a heart transplant in January 2002 at a cost of $1 million – which included follow-up care – according to Russ Heimerich, a spokesman for the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR). At the time, Heimerich said the 32-year-old prisoner was suffering from a fatal heart condition. [See: PLN, Sept. 2002, p.12].

Less than a year later the heart transplant recipient had died, the victim of what prison officials called a failure to adhere to the demanding medical protocols that follow such an operation. [See: PLN, Oct. 2003, p.28]. Transplant patients typically require close monitoring and a wide range of daily medications to prevent organ rejection and fight infections.

In 2004, a California federal court ordered the CDCR to contact transplant centers in the state to determine whether they would accept a prisoner as a candidate for a liver transplant. See: Rosado v. Alameida, 359 F.Supp.2d 1341 (S.D. Cal. 2004).

New York state prisoner Wilfredo Rodriguez received a $400,000 liver transplant in November 2005. [See: PLN, Feb. 2006, p.40]. When another New York prisoner, convicted of rape, was being evaluated in 2011 for a heart transplant, state lawmakers demanded a review of the policies that permitted such operations at taxpayers' expense.

"These reports raise a multitude of questions that demand and deserve answers for New York taxpayers, potential organ donors, and law-abiding families who are still waiting for life-saving transplants," said state Senator Michael Nozzolio. "We cannot allow law-abiding citizens to be denied transplants in favor of dangerous violent offenders, convicted of heinous crimes, who may never leave prison."

Apparently, Nozzolio was unaware that the provision of adequate healthcare by prison officials – including organ transplants when needed – is a Constitutional requirement. The U.S. Supreme Court ruled in Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97 (1976) that denying necessary medical care to prisoners constitutes cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment.

"You get a liver transplant because you meet the very strict criteria, not because we like you," remarked Dr. David Kaufman, the medical director at Strong Memorial Hospital, which performed the liver transplant for Rodriguez.

The New York prisoner seeking a heart transplant, Kenneth Pike, was screened for the operation but later declined the transplant for reasons that were not reported.

Meanwhile, the United Network for Organ Sharing (UNOS), a non-profit organization that manages the organ transplant system in the United States under a contract with the federal government, has taken the position that prisoners should not be precluded by their carceral status from receiving transplants, and should be eligible for such procedures to the same extent as non-incarcerated citizens.

People usually receive organ transplants according to their position on the waiting list, which is based on the severity of their medical condition. There are currently over 121,000 people on organ waiting lists nationwide.

When Prisoners Want to Donate Organs

AT THE OPPOSITE END OF THE SPECTRUM, controversy has erupted in several states about the ability of prisoners – including those on death row – to donate their organs, and the appropriateness of such donations.

In Mississippi, Governor Haley Barbour commuted the life sentences of sisters Gladys and Jamie Scott in December 2010, on the condition that Gladys donate one of her kidneys to Jamie. Both prisoners, who had served 16 years for an $11 armed robbery, were released in January 2011; Barbour's decision may have been partly motivated by fiscal concerns, as Jamie's dialysis was reportedly costing the state prison system around $190,000 per year. It is unclear whether the post-release kidney transplant occurred, as it was initially postponed for medical reasons. [See: PLN, May 2011, p.34].

Utah enacted the Inmate Medical Donation Act in March 2013, which allows voluntary organ donations from prisoners who die "while in the custody" of the Department of Corrections. The law states that prison officials may "release to an organ procurement organization ... the names and addresses of all inmates who complete and sign the document of gift form indicating they intend to make an anatomical gift."

In Ohio, Governor John R. Kasich placed the November 2013 execution of death row prisoner Ronald Phillips on hold in order to study the feasibility of allowing Phillips and other condemned prisoners to donate their organs. Phillips was sentenced to die for the 1993 rape and beating death of his girlfriend's 3-year-old daughter.

"Ronald Phillips committed a heinous crime for which he will face the death penalty," the governor said in a statement. "I realize this is a bit of uncharted territory for Ohio, but if another life can be saved by his willingness to donate his organs and tissues then we should allow for that to happen."

Phillips' request to donate his organs to sick relatives or others who need them was initially rejected by state prison officials. According to the governor's office, Phillips' non-vital organs, such as a kidney, would be removed and he would then be returned to death row pending his execution, which was re-scheduled for July 2014.

On March 21, 2014, Ohio Department of Rehabilitation and Correction chief counsel Stephen Gray said Phillips would not be able to donate his organs, as he could not do so in time to allow for a 100-day recuperation period prior to his new execution date.

Some people worry about the ethics of allowing death row prisoners to donate their organs. Jeff Orlowski, who heads Life Share Transplant Services, compared the process to organ harvesting – a practice that has been condemned in China, which until only recently harvested organs from executed prisoners. [See: PLN, March 2013, p.27; Sept. 2009, p.35; Jan. 2008, p.16; Sept. 2007, p.24].

Life Share Transplant Services keeps track of the organ donation registry in Oklahoma, where one state lawmaker predicted widespread support for his proposal to allow death row prisoners to donate their organs.

"I don't think it will be a tough sell," state Rep. Joe Dorman said in November 2013. "I think with the strong stance that we have with members of the legislature being pro-life, I certainly see this as a pro-life idea because you're saving lives with the actions of that prisoner seeking redemption" by donating his organs.

"You can't put a price on life," he added, apparently without irony.

Rep. Dorman said organs donated by willing prisoners would benefit people waiting for transplants – especially for organs that are difficult to find, The Oklahoman reported. His proposed legislation would allow prisoners to be anesthetized, have their organs removed and then be placed on life support until their executions can be carried out. Oklahoma uses lethal injection, which renders organs useless for post-execution transplants.

"The only options for executing someone to obtain vital organs is to either shoot them in the head or chop their head off and have a team of doctors ready to step in immediately," noted Arthur Caplan, professor of medical ethics at NYU Langone Medical Center.

Oregon death row prisoner Christian Longo has pushed the issue of organ donation for several years. "If I donated all of my organs today, I could clear nearly 1 percent of my state's organ waiting list. I am 37 years old and healthy; throwing my organs away after I am executed is nothing but a waste," he wrote in a New York Times editorial on March 5, 2011. Prison officials denied his request.

Longo, who founded an organization called Gifts of Anatomical Value from Everyone (GAVE), renewed his efforts to donate his organs in March 2014, offering to give a kidney to Kevin Gray, an Oregon resident with kidney failure who is on dialysis.

"I don't care if you're incarcerated, if you're my neighbor – if you're willing to donate an organ to save a life it's very breathtaking and I'm very grateful," Gray said, although he later rejected the offer after learning that Longo was on death row.

"The department looks at organ donation on a case-by-case basis," stated Oregon

Department of Corrections spokeswoman Jennifer Black. "If someone needs a bone marrow transplant or their mother needs a kidney and there's a match, then there's no reason that can't go forward," she said. "But it's not just a blanket 'yes.' All offenders can give part of their body away to somebody else. It has to be for the right reasons and the right person and all that."

Policies related to organ donations by prisoners, including those on death row, vary from state to state.

"There have been several instances in the United States within the last 20 years where condemned prisoners have requested to become organ donors, either upon their execution as a deceased donor or prior to execution as a living donor," UNOS said in a November 14, 2013 statement posted on the organization's website. "Ultimately the correctional authority must decide whether to allow any inmate to be evaluated for donation, and an organ procurement organization and/or transplant center must make medical decisions whether to accept any person as a donor and allow a transplant to proceed."

UNOS noted that organ donations from prisoners "present special concerns and vulnerabilities, and appropriate precautions are necessary to prevent the potential for coercion" – such as offering early release or other incentives in exchange for prisoners' organs. ■

Oklahoma Jailers Not Immune from Excessive Force Claims

THE OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT HAS held that jail officials are not immune from liability for excessive force claims under the Oklahoma Governmental Tort Claims Act (OGTCA).

On May 17, 2011, Daniel Bosh was detained at the Cherokee County Detention Center for failure to pay a traffic ticket. Video surveillance showed him standing at the booking desk with his hands cuffed behind his back.

Bosh reportedly complained to guard Gordon Chronister, Jr. that his handcuffs were too tight; in response, Chronister grabbed him from behind and slammed his head onto the booking desk. He then placed Bosh's head under his arm and fell backwards, causing Bosh to strike the top of his head on the floor.

According to the video footage, other guards quickly joined the attack. They moved Bosh to a shower area outside the camera's view, where they continued to assault him for an undisclosed period of time.

"The video speaks for itself," said Bosh's attorney, Mitchell Garrett.

Guards then left Bosh to languish in a cell without medical treatment for two days before taking him to a local hospital.

Having suffered fractured vertebrae, Bosh required surgery to fuse several discs along his spinal cord.

Chronister later claimed that he thought Bosh was going to spit on him; based on that assertion, and the fact that Bosh had a long criminal history that damaged his credibility, prosecutors did not pursue criminal charges against Chronister or other guards involved in the incident.

On September 29, 2011, Bosh filed a 42 U.S.C. § 1983 action in state court against the Cherokee County Governmental Building Authority ("Authority"), which operates the jail, and against Assistant Jail Administrator T.J. Girdner and the guards who had assaulted him. The defendants removed the case to federal court.

The federal district court dismissed Bosh's state tort claims as being barred by the OGTCA, 51 O.S. 2011 §§ 151 et seq., which "appears to allow the state, or, in this case the Authority, to elude tort liability when its employees beat and injure a citizen who is detained at one of its facilities."

Nevertheless, the district court allowed Bosh "to amend his complaint to assert a claim of excessive force" under Article 2, § 30 of the Oklahoma Constitution. The defendants moved to dismiss the constitutional claim, arguing that it too was barred by the OGTCA. On August 30, 2012, the federal court certified three questions of law to the Oklahoma Supreme Court related to the scope and application of the OGTCA.

In answering those questions, the Supreme Court first found that Article 2, § 30 "provides a private cause of action for excessive force, notwithstanding the requirements and limitations of the OGTCA." Construing the OGTCA "as providing blanket immunity ... would ... render the Constitutional protections afforded the citizens of this State as ineffective, and a nullity," the Court explained. Thus, excessive force claims brought under Article 2, § 30 are not barred by the OGTCA.

The Supreme Court then held that the cause of action it recognized with respect to excessive force claims under Article 2, § 30 applies retroactively "to all matters which were in the litigation pipeline, state and federal, when Bryson v. Oklahoma County, 2011 OK CIV APP 98, 261 P.3d 627 [(Okla. Ct. App. 2011)] was decided as well as any claims which arose when Bryson was decided."

Finally, the Court found that in regard to such claims under Article 2, § 30 of the Oklahoma Constitution, "respondeat superior applies to hold municipal corporations liable for the actions of their employees where those employees are acting within the scope of their employment."

Although the ruling was superficially amended and corrected on June 28, 2013, the outcome remained the same. See: Bosh v. Cherokee County Governmental Building Authority, 2013 OK 9, 305 P.3d 994 (Okla. 2013), rehearing denied.

Bosh's suit alleging excessive force claims remains pending before the federal district court, though it is now being litigated by his estate. On March 17, 2014, Bosh's wife notified the court that he had died. See: Bosh v. Cherokee County Governmental Building Authority, U.S.D.C. (E.D. Okla.), Case No. 6:11-cv-00376-JHP. ■

News in Brief

Alabama: Carbon Hill Mayor James “Pee Wee” Richardson, 61, was arrested on September 19, 2013 on multiple charges related to sexually abusing four prisoners at the city’s municipal jail; he was released eight days later after posting a $250,000 property bond. In addition to the criminal charges, Richardson faces a civil lawsuit filed by a former prisoner who claims he took her into his office and groped her. The civil suit includes 11 counts of alleged wrongdoing by Richardson or the city, and seeks compensatory, statutory and punitive damages as well as attorney’s fees.

Angola: A cell phone video, which went viral on the Internet, showed several Angola prison guards kicking prisoners and beating them with sticks, then laughing as they left them bleeding and crying on the floor. Amnesty International called the incident shocking and urged the government to prosecute the guards. In a rare reaction from one of Africa’s most authoritarian governments, on September 27, 2013, Angola officials suspended 16 prison guards and firemen in connection with the brutal attack. The prison’s director was among those suspended, and the Interior Ministry said criminal charges would likely follow.

Arizona: A Maricopa County jail employee was murdered in his driveway by a 15-year-old boy who police said was motivated by gangs, drugs and guns. The teen, identified on September 25, 2013 as Leonard Moreno, will be tried as an adult for the random shooting of Jorge Vargas, 27. Vargas was an eight-year employee of the sheriff’s Custody Support Bureau. Moreno’s mother and a friend also were arrested, accused of trying to dispose of evidence and helping him elude police.

Arkansas: On September 25, 2013, a man who escaped from a California prison in 1977 was taken into custody at his home in Jessierville, Arkansas, where he had been residing under an assumed name. Michael Ray Morrow scaled a fence at the California Institute for Men in Chino some 36 years earlier and was living as Carl Frank Wilson, a church-going grandfather. New technology was able to match Morrow’s fingerprints to those of his alias from a 1984 arrest. Morrow, now 70, was extradited to California.

Australia: A report issued on September 26, 2013 by the Independent Commission Against Corruption recommended prosecution for a Long Bay prison guard who showed up for tower duty while high on ecstasy, sold steroids to both prisoners and fellow guards, and lied to the commission about his conduct. Robert Di-Bona worked at the Special Programmes Centre at the prison. The commission also recommended that Di-Bona be fired.

California: Danne Desbrow will remember September 17, 2013 as a day with both good and bad news. First the bad: he was sentenced to 53 years to life in prison after being convicted of murder. Then the good: he got married ... by the same judge who had just sentenced him. Plus he got to eat a slice of wedding cake baked by San Diego Superior Court Judge Patricia Cookson, though there was no honeymoon. Desbrow intends to appeal his murder conviction.

Canada: Canada’s most notorious prison, Kingston Penitentiary, officially closed its doors on September 30, 2013 after 178 years in operation. The shutdown was a money-saving measure. The prisoners at Kingston were all transferred to other facilities and the prison will begin offering guided tours as a fundraiser for the United Way. Sometimes called Canada’s Alcatraz, Kingston Penitentiary opened in 1835, before Canada was formed as a country.

Colorado: On September 25, 2013, a Pitkin County jailer obtained a restraining order against a prisoner who threatened her family. Deputy Deborah Kendrick sought the order to prevent Robert Rice from contacting her, her husband – who is a Pitkin County sheriff’s deputy – and one of their family members. Kendrick said Rice had told her, “When I get out of here, I’m going to hurt your family.” The order specified that Rice could have limited contact with Kendrick while he is incarcerated at the jail.

El Salvador: Six Mara Salvatrucha (MS-13) gang members were hanged during a riot at a juvenile rehabilitation center in Tonacatepeque on September 24, 2013 – El Salvador’s Prisoners’ Day. Two of the dead were minors and four were adults who had been sentenced at a younger age. Police believe the murders were carefully calculated gang killings. Prisons in El Salvador are notoriously overcrowded and violent as thousands of members of the country’s notorious MS-13 and 18th Street gangs await trial or serve their sentences. The two rival gangs signed a truce in March 2012 but there is fear it may be crumbling, with gang-related murders on the rise.

Florida: On September 26, 2013, Boyd Wallace Higginbotham, Jr. was sentenced to life in prison for the March 2008 stabbing death of fellow prisoner Steven Pritchard in the mess hall at FCC Coleman in

Drug Policy Alliance, the nation’s leading organization working to end the war on drugs, is looking for cases that might be eligible for executive clemency in NYS. If you know of any cases please contact Anthony Papa at tpapa@drugpolicy.org or 212-613-8037 or write him at Drug Policy Alliance/131 West 33rd Street/15th Floor /NY, NY 10001/Attn: Clemency Cases NYS Sumter County. A federal jury found Higginbotham guilty of first-degree murder. The men had been involved in an argument that escalated over several days until Higginbotham grabbed Pritchard around the neck and repeatedly stabbed him.

Florida: Tomoka Correctional Facility Major Shannon Wiggins, 44, was arrested on grand theft charges in September 2013. Wiggins, who worked part-time as a security guard at the Daytona International Speedway, was charged with stealing more than $100,000 worth of Speedway merchandise and selling it on eBay. A friend who was helping him sell the merchandise has not yet been arrested but is under investigation. Wiggins was placed on leave by the Florida Department of Corrections.

France: On September 25, 2013, Sabrina Bonner, 25, and her boyfriend, prisoner Lionel Barthelemy, 31, each received 20-year sentences for raping Bonner's 4-year-old son in 2010 in the visiting area of the Toul detention center. Behind visitation room windows covered with black trash bags, as is standard practice in French prisons for privacy, Bonner blindfolded the boy, made him kneel on a chair and held him by the arms as Barthelemy raped him. Bonner then returned with her son for a second visit, knowing that he would be raped again. A lawyer representing the child said he intends to initiate legal proceedings against the prison.

Hawaii: Two Oahu Community Correctional Center guards, Kevin Ignacio and Ismael Castro, face trial over allegations that they beat prisoner Jeffrey Diaz bloody in October 2012. Ignacio is accused of repeatedly punching Diaz in the head and face, while Castro was caught on surveillance video kicking him in the head. On September 17, 2013, Judge Patrick Border expressed his displeasure when the two guards failed to appear with their attorneys at a hearing to combine their criminal cases.

Illinois: When Cook County jail guards told prisoner Jeremiah Harris to pack up to go home on September 16, 2013, he told them to "quit playin'." Harris, 25, who had been serving a 12-year sentence as a habitual criminal and was being held at the Cook County jail for a court appearance, became the third person in 2013 to be mistakenly released. Earlier that year, prisoners Steven Robbins and Steven Derkits were erroneously released by jailers.

Indiana: Prisoners at the Delaware County Jail are adjusting to frosted windows in their cells, which let sunlight in but prevent unauthorized communication with the outside world. The windows have been a source of concern in the decades since the jail was built, because prisoners sometimes expose themselves or make obscene gestures to passersby on the street. Sheriff Mike Scroggins told reporters on September 3, 2013 that the "fix," a coating of paint applied to the windows, had cost around $91.

Kansas: Ness County Jail escapee Benito Cardenas, Jr., 38, apologized to his victims and law enforcement officials before being sentenced in back-to-back hearings for a two-day crime spree that occurred after he cut through four bars at the jail in August 2012. After escaping, Cardenas stole a van, burglarized a residence and accosted two women before surrendering to officers. He was sentenced on September 24, 2013 to 151 months in prison on two counts of aggravated burglary and a single count of aggravated escape, to be served consecutive to his life sentence on unrelated charges.

Kentucky: Prisoner Ashley Marler, four months pregnant, escaped twice in the same week. She failed to return to the Fayette County Detention Center from a medical pass on September 16, 2013, and was arrested the next day and charged with escape. On September 24, 2013, Marler was taken to the same medical clinic. She reportedly left her clothing behind, climbed into the ceiling and fled wearing only a towel and white t-shirt. She was recaptured two days later.

Kentucky: Former FCI Ashland guard James Lewis and Cindy Gates, the girlfriend of a prisoner at the facility, both pleaded not guilty in September 2013 to charges related to smuggling contraband into the prison. Gates' boyfriend, prisoner Gary Musick, was accused of participating in the scheme by telling Gates and Lewis what items to procure and directing other prisoners to sell the items. The contraband included marijuana, tobacco, cell phones and sexually explicit photos.

Louisiana: On September 19, 2013, Floyd Tillman, 26, pleaded not guilty to attempted second-degree murder after ramming the gates of the state penitentiary at Angola with his car, while guards opened fire on him. Tillman had taken his daughters, ages 8 months and 2 years, from Terrebonne Parish. He then drove to the prison and argued with guards about taking a tour. After being told many times there were no tours that day, he began ramming the gate. It is anticipated that Tillman's defense attorney will seek a mental health evaluation for his client.

Michigan: An attorney representing Oakland County jail guard Garry Jackson told a judge on September 16, 2013 that Jackson vehemently denied having sexual contact with a female prisoner in a broom closet while on duty at the jail. The incident was discovered after other prisoners started talking about a sexual relationship between Jackson and a 24-year-old prisoner. Although the investigation revealed that the sex was consensual, Jackson was charged with three felony counts of criminal sexual conduct; he was released on $10,000 personal bond and ordered not to have contact with the female prisoner.

Myanmar: On September 13, 2013, a riot at Nine Mile Prison in Kawthaung Township resulted in the death of one prisoner and injuries to seven others. The incident was sparked after Warden Saw Hla Chit ordered prison staff to beat and kick prisoners Ye Ko Hlaing and Htun Htun in retaliation for their participation in a fight. Officials cut the power lines to the facility in an attempt to disperse the rioters, but gunfire broke out shortly after the prison went dark. The prisoner who died, identified as Htay Nge, and the other casualties suffered gunshot wounds.

New Jersey: Bobby Singletary, 55, a former guard, was convicted on September 27, 2013 of smuggling heroin and marijuana into the Adult Diagnostic and Treatment Center in Avenel, a facility for sex offenders. A prisoner who was tried with him was acquitted of all charges. Jurors heard how Singletary had prisoners pay for drugs by wiring money to outside accomplices; he was found guilty of conspiracy, official misconduct and bribery.

New Mexico: Former Columbus Police Chief Angelo Vega was on the payroll of the local Juarez Cartel at the same time he collected a $40,000 annual salary for his public position, according to testimony in federal court on September 25, 2013. A witness stated that Vega received $2,000 a month plus bonuses from the cartel for performing background and license plate checks, buying military gear and allowing cartel members to use official vehicles. Vega's wife is Assistant U.S. Attorney Paula Burnett; she has not been charged with any crime.

New York: As part of a September 30, 2013 plea bargain, prison guard Aaron A. Netto, 36, agreed to resign from his position at the Riverview Correctional Facility. He was charged with possessing property stolen from several construction sites. In addition to resigning, he faces up to three years' probation and will pay $1,600 in restitution. Netto entered an Alford plea, meaning he did not admit to the allegations but pled guilty to avoid the possibility of being convicted at trial.

Ohio: On September 18, 2013, three Ohio Department of Youth Services guards were arraigned on charges of assaulting a teenager at the Scioto Juvenile Correctional Facility. Though details of the incident were at first sketchy, guards Laurel Jeffreys, Nathaniel Strong and Antonio Keith were identified as the suspects who allegedly beat the unnamed 15-year-old. The state's Youth Services agency was recently named in a U.S. Bureau of Justice Statistics report as among the worst in the nation for rape and sexual assaults of juvenile prisoners.

Oklahoma: According to court documents, Shealane Fields, a corporal who was fired from her job at the Logan County Detention Center on September 24, 2013, is accused of committing several felonies for prisoner Daniel Clark, with whom she developed a relationship. Fields allegedly smuggled contraband into the jail for Clark, including tobacco, a lighter, a flat blade screwdriver, crazy glue and a cell phone. Investigators also found 49 love letters, including one where the couple planned a tryst in a medical cell and another where they talked about a plan for Clark to walk out of the jail.

Oklahoma: Tulsa County jail guard Cory Laddell Jones, 22, was arrested on September 21, 2013 on charges of bringing contraband into the facility for a $100 payment. The arrest report said a prisoner told jail officials that Jones was paid to smuggle packages he obtained from a woman he arranged to meet at a convenience store. Jones was jailed on more than $25,000 bond.

Pennsylvania: On September 17, 2013, Warden John Walton of the Westmoreland County Prison announced a new policy instituted by the facility's contract healthcare provider that requires all female prisoners to submit to pregnancy tests. The policy was created after an unidentified prisoner lied about not being pregnant and not being addicted to drugs. In order to protect the well-being of their unborn children, pregnant prisoners will receive obstetrics care and be weaned off drugs. Four percent of female prisoners at the Westmoreland County Prison were pregnant in the first nine months of 2013.

Pennsylvania: During a preliminary hearing on September 27, 2013, details emerged about why a Bucks County prison guard fired two gunshots in the direction of an acquaintance, Pearson Crosby, following an early morning altercation in June 2013. Anthony Pekarski, 26, free on $50,000 unsecured bail, was charged with simple assault, reckless endangering, disorderly conduct and possession of a weapon. He admitted firing the shots because his girlfriend, who had been sitting beside Crosby in the backseat of Pekarski's car, had an "uncomfortable look" and he wanted to scare Crosby away.

Saudi Arabia: On September 25, 2013, a prisoner returned after a 24-hour family visit wearing an explosive belt and threatened to detonate it, taking 200 prisoners hostage in the process. Prison officials in Madinah said the man was not mentally ill and made no demands during the six-hour standoff. According to a prison source, Saudi media reports about the incident were not accurate; the man had a gun as well as explosives. There were no reports of damage or casualties.

the Lee Correctional Institute. On September 8, 2013, the website Charleston Thug Life published Facebook postings Henry had made using a contraband cell phone, prompting a shakedown at the prison. Henry was charged with disciplinary violations, placed in segregation and lost good time credits and canteen, telephone and visitation privileges.

South Dakota: Robert Corsini was serving a seven-day jail term with work release after being caught in two separate online prostitution stings. In court on September 10, 2013, a judge found it “implausible” that Corsini had invited yet another prostitute he found online to meet him at his home while he was on work release. Judge John Schlinggen sentenced Corsini to 90 more days in jail – this time without the option of work release.

Tennessee: Hawkins County jail guard

Scott Winkle “laid hands” on a prisoner while walking him back to a cell following a disturbance. Although the physical contact did not rise to the level of assault and no criminal charges were filed, Winkle was fired on September 19, 2013 for violating county regulations. He had recently attended a training session on appropriate physical contact in response to a February 2013 staff-on-prisoner assault incident. In that case, jailer Roy Junior Mathes was charged with misdemeanor assault. ■

A Home of Their Own

by Lisa Riordan Seville and Graham Kates

RECOVERY IS WORK THAT TERRANCE Streeter knows.

At 56, he is clean. No more drinking, no more drugs. After graduating from an alcohol recovery program two years ago, he went looking for a home. In New York City, his $855 monthly disability check doesn't go far.

Despite the distance he traveled from addiction, Streeter in late 2012 found himself homeless and suicidal.

He checked himself into the psychiatric ward of a city hospital, where a social worker eventually found him somewhere she said was safe and drug-free: a residence run by a substance abuse treatment program called Narco Freedom.

When he walked through the door of that home, a rundown former hotel on Beach 116 Street, in the Rockaway neighborhood of Queens, Streeter was shocked.

Cockroaches skittered across the floor. The plumbing was bad, the bathroom moldy.

"Are you kidding me?" he remembers saying to himself. "This is recovery?"

Streeter had entered the largely unregulated system of group homes that has emerged in cities throughout the country, often catering to poor people struggling with substance abuse, homelessness, or returning from prison.

In New York City, where the demand for affordable housing is especially high, these houses have become a little discussed, but deeply ingrained, piece of the recovery and reentry landscape.

Unlike government-sanctioned halfway houses, these homes don't operate treatment programs on-site, but they do often require residents to attend outpatient therapy.

The New York City facilities, variously known as "three-quarter houses," "sober homes" and "transitional housing," bring in millions of dollars each year in taxpayer funds for landlords and operators, largely through welfare, Medicaid and disability payments.

Yet no city or state agency licenses or oversees the homes, creating a system in which some houses institute rules that advocates say violate tenant laws and patient rights.

Housing and tenants' advocates estimate there are more than 300 of these buildings in New York alone. Most are located in the city's poorest neighborhoods, and many have been slapped with violations of city codes.

Road to Recovery

FROM LOS ANGELES TO LONG ISLAND, NEW York, "sober homes" have emerged as part of the road to recovery.

Well-run homes can be a positive step for those trying to turn their lives around, according to Dr. Leonard A. Jason, director of the Center for Community Research at DePaul University.

Jason says he has visited many homes that live up to their stated goals, helping residents develop a sense of responsibility and giving them the skills and confidence to pursue productive lives.

"If it's a really well-run sober living home, that house could be a place of real health," says Jason, who recently put out a policy statement aimed at helping to develop research and best practices.

"It can be done right, but it can just as easily be done very wrong."

And when it has gone wrong, authorities have raised doubts about the entire industry.

A spike of private sober homes in Los Angeles, where residents may pay $500 each month for a bed, has prompted the city to propose an ordinance to shut them down.

Long Island and suburban Boston have also had a slew of complaints and safety issues.

In Massachusetts, problems extended to relationships between the homes and medical providers. In 2007 and 2010, the Massachusetts Attorney General accused two medical labs of engaging in kickback schemes, receiving referrals from sober homes with which the labs had a financial relationship.

After more than $20 million in settlements and restitution, the state proposed legislation to stop the practice.

In New York City, people arrive at the homes from hospitals, social service agencies, prison, the street and by word of mouth.

Advocates claim that some of the estimated 300 houses are simply boarding houses, stuffed with bunks leased to poor individuals.

Others offer those with few options a hard-to-refuse tradeoff: a bed, in return for a commitment to attend a treatment program associated with the house. While the system serves women, most residents are men.

Some residents kick their habits and move on with their lives. Their beds are quickly filled.

Half a dozen people interviewed by The Crime Report said they attended treatment they did not need in order to have a place to sleep.

"It is very hard to get housing if you do not have a substance abuse problem," said Debbie Boar, Deputy Director of Reentry Initiatives at Harlem Community Justice Center, which works with people returning from prison. "Besides the shelter system, if you don't say you have a drug problem, there's no housing."

Falling Through the Cracks

TERRANCE STREETER HAD GRADUATED from an addiction program in 2011, and stayed clean, but he knew that agreeing to go back to treatment meant a bed to sleep in.

"I ended up at Narco Freedom because I fell through the cracks," said Streeter. "I didn't need treatment for drugs. I needed a home. I didn't want to be on the streets."

In 2010, city homeless advocates successfully petitioned the city to stop referring homeless people to pay-by-the-bunk homes with a history of building complaints.

Advocates have also raised questions about the programs tied to sober homes.

It is not illegal for a certified substance abuse treatment provider to also operate uncertified housing, according to a spokesperson with the state Office of Alcohol and Substance Abuse Services (OASAS), which certifies drug programs.

But the agency has raised concerns about relationships between the two.

In a 2011 letter to the executive director of CIS Counseling Services, a now-closed substance abuse clinic that also ran sober homes, an OASAS administrator questioned whether rules at the homes constituted "coercion and undue influence."

"Patients reported the practice of mandatory outpatient treatment as a requirement for admission into a sober home residence," wrote Charles Monson, OASAS associate commissioner for the Division of Quality Assurance and Performance Improvement.

"This practice violates Patient Rights regulations," the letter said, adding it "should be immediately ceased."

CIS Counseling shuttered soon after, but others appear to use a similar model.

The Rockaway building, for example, is part of a network of houses associated with Narco Freedom, a non-profit founded in the 1970s, which is now one of the largest treatment programs in the city.

Property records and interviews with tenants and employees confirm that the organization operates at least twenty homes.

Interviews by The Crime Report with more than two dozen residents, treatment advocates and employees of Narco Freedom houses, as well as a review of hundreds of public records and agency documents, showed how real estate developers partnered with Narco Freedom to turn dilapidated buildings into a sober home network using a similar model as CIS Counseling. (Narco Freedom did not respond to The Crime Report's repeated requests for interviews).

Rent of $215 a Month

IT WORKS LIKE THIS: A LANDLORD LEASES the building to an outpatient drug treatment program, which offers its clients a bed for the tenure of their treatment. The client typically pays rent of $215 a month through a welfare shelter subsidy from the city's Human Resources Administration (HRA).

In turn, the treatment programs, generally funded almost entirely by Medicaid, a public health care program for the poor, pay the landlords a monthly rent, generally much higher than what landlords would make by collecting $215 a month per tenant.

In New York, Medicaid generally pays about $70 for each group session that its beneficiaries attend, sometimes up to five times per week.

Residents said missed sessions must be made up on weekends, a mandate echoed in signs posted in one Narco Freedom house The Crime Report visited. Those who miss too many sessions, or who exhaust their treatment funding, are "discharged," or evicted.

Ann Jacobs, director of the Prisoner Reentry Institute at the John Jay College of Criminal Justice, has been studying the role that these houses play in New York City's post-incarceration system. The housing has become essential for those returning from prison and in need of a bed, Jacobs said.

But she questioned the strings attached, including whether building managers have the right to mandate drug treatment to specific providers.

"Where do they get the authority, or the ability to provide that kind of oversight?" she said, referring to the clinical training required to prescribe substance abuse treatment. "Who authorized or deputized them?"

While various agencies provide the taxpayer dollars that help the homes run, none appears to certify or oversee New York's growing number of sober homes.

OASAS certifies drug treatment programs, but despite the agency's concerns about the sober homes associated with CIS Counseling, OASAS Communication Director Jannette Rondo told The Crime Report that sober houses are out of the agency's purview.

"The scope of our legal authority is related to services provided in OASAS certified treatment programs which does not include housing," she wrote in an email. "When those types of issues are raised we will make referrals to the appropriate state and local authorities."

Rondo declined to name those authorities, "as the matters are still likely the subject of ongoing investigations."

HRA issues welfare shelter payments on behalf of residents, but a spokesperson said HRA "does not place people receiving cash assistance in apartments" nor does it certify or inspect the housing.

The New York State Department of Corrections and Community Supervision, or DOCCS, officially has a five-year, $866,250 contract with Narco Freedom for 20 beds meant to help parolees transition back into the community.

This gives the agency some authority over those beds, yet they are only a fraction of those used by parolees. DOCCS records show that as of May 2013 more than 425 parolees lived at addresses identified by The Crime Report as Narco Freedom sober homes, sometimes dozens per address.

DOCCS said that while it refers parolees to treatment programs, and must approve any residence in which parolees live, it does not refer directly to housing, nor does it certify or oversee the housing.

"We're not in charge of finding residences," said DOCCS spokesperson Thomas Mailey. He could not explain why so many parolees appear to end up at Narco Freedom houses.

The system has grown with few eyes on it, leaving neighborhoods with little say when houses come in, and residents within them little recourse if things go wrong.

Cast Adrift

WHEN JAMES GREGORY WAS PAROLED from prison, he didn't have much money or a family to take him in.

As a condition of a 2009 drug conviction, his parole officer mandated him to a drug treatment program at Narco Freedom, which, he was told, could also offer him a bed.

On August 2, 2010, he went to Narco Freedom intake in the Bronx. There, he was assigned to "Freedom House III," a five-story building nearby at E. 152nd Street.

Attending Narco Freedom drug treatment sessions was a house rule.

Like all parolees, Gregory had to have the residence signed off by his parole officer.

DOCCS is familiar with the building. In April 2012, DOCCS records showed 89 parolees lived at that address.

Though DOCCS asserts it does not mandate parolees to specific housing, "sober homes" have come to serve the parole process.

"They're another set of eyes for us, just to make sure that someone's reentry into the community is going the way it should," said DOCCS spokesman Mailey.

When Gregory arrived at Freedom House III, "things were really bad," he recalled during an interview in April 2012.

A sturdy man carefully dressed in a hat and a thick gold chain, he spoke matter-of-factly about the bedbugs in the house and how, several times during the winter of 2011, there was no heat or hot water, a memory confirmed by public records.

But he said he was most troubled watching his fellow residents tossed out if they missed group or exhausted their treatment funding.

"They were throwing people out left and right," said Gregory. He described men whose belongings were stuffed in black plastic bags, then put out on the curb with their owners.

"This is what happens when they illegally put you out: you go backwards," said Gregory. "You get depressed. You start using. When you start using, you commit crimes."

A few times, he said, residents tried to protest, telling police they had a right to stay under city housing laws, which require landlords to get court orders before evicting tenants.

"But every time the police came, they'd be on the side of Narco Freedom," he said. "Their excuse is that this is a program."

Eventually it was Gregory's turn. On February 2, 2012, he came home to the news that it was time to leave. He took Narco Freedom to court.

In court filings, Narco Freedom stated it operates the homes "for temporary use by its program participants during their treatment period."

Because Narco Freedom holds the lease, and is therefore the tenant, those who sleep in the bunks are not tenants but "licensees," argued Narco Freedom's attorney.

When that treatment is done, he argued, Narco Freedom had the right to make them leave without formal evictions.

The court did not agree, ruling that Narco Freedom and Gregory had a landlord-tenant relationship.

Gregory returned to Freedom House III.

The case was a victory for others who live in this gray world, said his attorney, Matthew Main of MFY Legal Services, which has brought several suits on behalf of sober home residents, including those who once lived at homes run by CIS Counseling Services.

While Main said he believes three-quarter houses address a desperate need, he thinks the system often harms the very people it purports to help.

"This system is like a conveyor belt that grabs the most vulnerable people from our communities," said Main. "It takes people who don't have anywhere else to turn, stuffs them into these dilapidated apartments, and has them stay there to attend a treatment program only for as long as it's necessary to recover. And then spits them out."

A Booming Business

NARCO FREEDOM IS THE "#1 OUTPATIENT alcohol and substance abuse treatment program in the city," according to its website. In 2012, OASAS records show the organization's outpatient and methadone clinics served about 7,770 unique patients.

Narco Freedom's revenue was $46.7 million in 2011, according to its most recent tax filings.

About 90 percent of the organization's revenue typically comes from Medicaid payments for outpatient substance abuse treatment and its methadone program. Filings show CEO Alan Brand earned a salary of $386,000 that year.

Despite a booming business, routine certification reports obtained from OASAS through a Freedom of Information request point to issues at the program.

One routine OASAS review, conducted in March 2012 at the Narco Freedom program at 250 Grand Concourse in the Bronx, found that patients were not responding to treatment or meeting their defined goals.

For example, in 19 of the 20 cases studied, patients had tested positive for illicit drugs twice within three months. Their treatment plans had not been changed to address the continued drug use.

Reviewers also found that Narco Freedom had submitted reports to OASAS with inaccurate admittance and discharge dates. Nevertheless, the program was recertified.

OASAS spokesperson Rondo said the program is "subject to ongoing monitoring."

A review from one former resident of Narco Freedom's house in Rockaway was more blunt.

"They got low standards," he said, asking not to be named for fear of retribution. "As long as residents go to group, Narco Freedom doesn't care what they do."

"Guaranteed Rent"

NARCO FREEDOM'S SOBER HOUSING HAS proven a successful model for another person as well: Jay Deutchman, who, property records show, owns at least six buildings used as Narco Freedom houses, a relationship stretching back about 15 years.

He also owns at least one used as a home by the now-defunct CIS Counseling Services. (MFY Legal Services is currently engaged in litigation on behalf of former tenants at the home).

He maintains an office in that former sober home in Greenpoint, Brooklyn, where in February 2012 he puffed through cigarettes while working both hands to answer calls.

In between, he explained how the city's tenant-friendly laws make leasing to an organization preferable to leasing rooms or apartments to individuals, who may not keep up their end of the rental agreement.

"When you have a not-for-profit there's good money," Deutchman said. "When you have a tenant who doesn't care about anyone or anything, it's not as good."

He added that leasing to non-profits has "worked out in my buildings for years."

Deutchman told concerned residents in Rockaway as much in April 2010, after closing his $2.7 million purchase of the Rockaway Park Hotel, where Terrance Streeter found himself two years later.

"We like guaranteed rentals and therefore we take people that have subsidies from the government," he told the local paper, The Wave.

Though displeased about the perceived "halfway house" coming to the neighborhood, Danny Russiello, president of the local 100th Precinct Community Council, said the neighborhood had little recourse against a private landlord.

Locals soon learned Deutchman had leased the hotel to Narco Freedom. After repeated complaints to Narco Freedom about residents of the house loitering and bothering passersby, things improved.

"They did want to work with us," said Russiello.

But he said cleaning things up shouldn't have taken so much on the part of Rock-away residents.

"The responsibility should be up to the people running the program," he said.

Finding a Solution

AT THE PRISONER REENTRY INSTITUTE, Ann Jacobs wrestles with the quandary these homes present.

"They're bad and they need to be improved, but it would be a disaster if there was just an enforcement reaction and they were closed wholesale," she said. Residents could end up at the doors of the shelters they sought to avoid, which are already stretched to meet the needs of nearly 50,000 homeless each day.

"The homeless system isn't equipped to deal with thousands of more people," Jacobs said.

Legislators in Suffolk County, New York are working on a solution with a plan they say will regulate the system without forcing thousands of residents to the street.

The "Suffolk Healthy Sober Home Act" calls for OASAS and the Suffolk County Group Home Oversight Board to monitor and certify all sober homes. If passed, the homes would undergo regular building inspections.

Those operating without certification would be fined $10,000. Operators would also be required to "demonstrate good moral character," according to a press release by State Senator Lee Zeldin, the bill's sponsor.

But no such oversight was in place in October 2012 when Terrance Streeter arrived in Queens where, three days later, Hurricane Sandy hit.

"On October 29th, the windows blew in," Streeter remembered. The house went dark. Pipes burst. Men waded through sewage-laden water.

Streeter said residents were told that Narco Freedom would evacuate them, but no one arrived. Instead, on the first Tuesday after the storm, police vans showed up to cart the residents away.

For months, Streeter moved through emergency shelters to temporary hotel rooms for the displaced, unsure of what he would do when the largess of the Federal Emergency Management Agency ran thin.

In February 2013, Streeter received good news. As a hurricane victim, he qualified for shelter.

At the Frederick Douglass Houses, a public housing complex in Manhattan, Streeter found what he had searched for since getting sober.

It is clean. It is quiet. For one-third of his monthly disability check, it is his.

It took a deluge, but he has a place to call home.

"I have my own apartment," he said. "It's a studio apartment, but it's okay for now."

Life (and Death) in a "Three-Quarter Home"

DESPITE HER SON'S LONG ADDICTION TO painkillers, Kelly O'Neill had never before asked him to move out of their home in Suffolk County, New York.

But in the fall of 2010, 19-year-old Billy DeVito became too difficult to live with and she told him to leave. She hoped it would be a wake-up call.

"I picked up his bags and put him out," she said in an interview. "I never did that before."

She helped arrange for him to move into a facility with a promising sounding description: a "sober home."

But four months later, Billy DeVito was dead.

He had overdosed on heroin – in a place where drugs and alcohol were supposed to be forbidden.

The home where DeVito died was one of hundreds of similar programs that have become a crucial – yet often dangerously unregulated – component of substance abuse treatment and prisoner re-entry in New York State.

For years, local officials have been struggling without success to convince the myriad state agencies that interact with these homes – also known as three-quarter houses – to effectively monitor them.

In March 2013, the Suffolk Sober Home Oversight Board, a committee tasked by the county legislature with coming up with a solution, issued a request for qualifications (RFQ).

The board offered to pay $500 per resident – $200 more than the state's Department of Social Services currently pays – to any qualified firm that would agree to provide 24-hour supervision, a zero tolerance policy for drugs and alcohol, and submit to regular inspections.

New Legislation

ON OCTOBER 15, 2013 THE BOARD MET to discuss the RFQ, as well as a new piece of legislation, "The Suffolk Healthy Sober Home Act," which would codify many of the board's qualifications and create an anonymous hotline for resident complaints.

Neither the legislation nor the RFQ has gained much steam, members of the board noted during the meeting.

The board received only three responses and none promised to meet all the qualifications.

Rosemary Dehlow, chief program officer for Community Housing Innovations, told the board her firm wouldn't participate because the new restrictions are too costly.

"Five hundred dollars is not going to cut it," Dehlow said. "Everything in this RFQ I believe in. You want solid housing; you want restrictions on certain things; you want to make sure they're clean."

But, Dehlow said, the legislation and the RFQ ignore the underlying void that sober homes have come to fill.

"Why do sober homes have 20 people in a house? It's about affordable housing," Dehlow said.

An hour's drive away in New York City, where 50,000 people struggle with homelessness each day and the demand for affordable housing is especially high, three-quarter homes have become a critical part of the recovery and reentry landscape.

A study of the New York City homes, published in October 2013 by the Prisoner Reentry Institute at the John Jay College of Criminal Justice, reveals that "building code violations are rampant at the houses, which are funded almost entirely by public dollars."

"Tenants described small rooms with two to four bunk beds accommodating four to eight people. In some cases, bunk beds are placed in living rooms, hallways, and even kitchens," according to the study.

"Infestations of bed bugs, rats, mice, roaches, and other vermin often plague dwellings, and structural issues commonly remain in dangerous disrepair."

Despite the squalid conditions, New York City housing advocates and officials are struggling against a system that critics say provides only two options for problem buildings: looking the other way, or perhaps worse, shutting them down wholesale.

According to Jerilyn Perine, executive director of the non-profit Citizens

Housing Planning Committee, that could mean a return to prison for parolees who must live at their declared addresses; for those hoping to avoid the city's notorious homeless shelters, it could mean a return to the street.

"It's the classic public policy conundrum," Perine told a public forum at John Jay College on October 17, 2013.

"The axe that government has ... is a vacate order. That punishes the owner a little bit, but it really punishes the people living in these places," added Perine, a former commissioner of the city's Department of Housing Preservation and Development.

The report, based on data from focus groups, documents a complicated web of public monies flowing into sober homes and three-quarter houses.

In New York City, the Human Resources Administration pays $215 per month for each qualifying tenant; those who receive Social Security or unemployment benefits pay $350.

Major Profits

IT DOESN'T SOUND LIKE MUCH, BUT WITH residents stuffed eight to a room, it can mean major profits for those who operate the houses.

An investigation by The Crime Report and the Prisoner Reentry Institute study each found rampant claims that certain sober home operators, who often also collect Medicaid and disability payments from residents, were illegally coercing residents to attend specific drug treatment programs.

Tanya Kessler, a staff attorney at the Three-Quarter House Project at MFY Legal Services, a firm that has brought several suits on behalf of sober home residents, suggested at the John Jay forum that some operators get kickbacks for referring residents.

"The question becomes, what is the connection?" Kessler said. "Why would a landlord be so invested in their tenants going to that specific program? What we hear over and over again is that there's a money thing going on."

At both the Suffolk and John Jay discussions, advocates and local officials heard from state officials who argued their agencies were incapable of assuming greater oversight responsibilities.

Debbie Egel, a staff attorney for the New York State Office of Alcoholism and Substance Abuse Services, said at the Suffolk hearing that the only way an oversight initiative can work is if it has the cooperation of all the agencies that feed funds into sober homes.

"OASAS can't fix this problem by itself, that's the reality," Egel said. "Everyone can blame DSS (New York State's Department of Social Services), but this is a partnership of multiple agencies on different levels that have to face what's going on." For O'Neill, whose son died in a Suffolk sober home, Egel's explanation rings true.

O'Neill addressed the board at the Suffolk County hearing, with a grim recital of the state agencies she reached out to after her son's death.

First, she wrote to the office of state Attorney General Eric Schneiderman and was advised to contact OASAS. Her letter, she said, was passed on to DSS—with an explanation that it was not within their jurisdiction.

DSS repeated the response.

"It was being passed all over, because no one had any jurisdiction. I was flabbergasted," O'Neill said.

When her son left three years ago, O'Neill thought she was sending him to a safe place to deal with his addiction, but as she navigated New York's labyrinth of oversight agencies, she realized she had let her son move to a place where no one was watching out for him.

"I have to live with this every second of my life ... when you hear 'sober house,' you think 'sober,' but it clearly wasn't a safe environment," O'Neill said. ■

THIS MONTH'S ISSUE OF PRISON LEGAL News marks 24 years and 284 issues, which makes PLN the longest continuously-published prisoners' rights publication in U.S. history. We have grown significantly from a ten-page, hand-typed newsletter to our current 64-page magazine format. While some things have changed over the years others have remained constant, such as continuing to bring our readers high quality news and legal information they can use to help themselves and advocate for the rights of prisoners.

Another constant, which continues to distract us from our publishing work, is the ongoing government censorship of PLN and the books we distribute. The first three issues of PLN were banned in all Washington State prisons when we first began publishing in 1990. Today we have been banned in the state of Florida since 2009 – which is the subject of pending litigation – and have filed suit against the Nevada DOC for censoring PLN's books.

In addition to prison systems, many jails around the country ban all books and magazines and even letter correspondence from PLN to prisoners. We currently have three staff attorneys and two paralegals whose primary mission is to simply ensure that prisoners can receive PLN and the books we distribute. Perhaps someday I will live in a country that respects freedom of speech and the notion of an independent media, but I think Iceland is too cold.

Likewise, we continue to meet resistance from government agencies when we submit public records requests, and have to file lawsuits to obtain documents pertaining to prisons and jails. Such records are in theory public but in reality remain shrouded in secrecy.

I would like to thank everyone who has helped make PLN possible over the years: our subscribers, donors, supporters, volunteers, employees, attorneys and many others who at this point are far too numerous to name. As we approach our 25th year of publishing, we plan to expand our circulation and ask for your help in doing so. Greater circulation ensures that we keep our subscription costs down and also widens the impact we have. If you know someone who might be interested in PLN, whether imprisoned or not, please ask them to subscribe.

Further, expanding the number of our advertisers allows us to bring you even more news and legal content, as more advertisers lets us increase our page count. If you do business with companies that are interested in reaching an incarcerated audience, let them know about PLN and tell them to contact us. If you patronize companies that advertise in PLN, let them know where you saw their ad and ask them to continue advertising.

Lastly, we try not to make mistakes in PLN, but we correct them when we do. Last month's cover story interview with Noam Chomsky stated that Professor Chomsky is 75 years old. He is actually 85.

Enjoy this issue of PLN and please encourage others to subscribe. ■

Seventh Circuit Reverses Dismissal of Prisoner's 99-Page Complaint

by Mark Wilson

THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS has reversed a district court's finding that a prisoner's "99-page complaint defies understanding, rendering it unintelligible and subject to dismissal on that basis."

In 2011, federal prisoner Jurijus Kadamovas, who is Lithuanian and claims to be English-illiterate, filed a Bivens action alleging that prison officials violated his religious rights and subjected him to cruel and unusual punishment.

Before the defendants filed an appearance in the case, an Indiana federal district court dismissed Kadamovas' complaint with leave to amend. The case was later dismissed with prejudice after he failed to file an amended complaint.

In an opinion authored by Judge Posner, the Seventh Circuit explained that "length and unintelligibility, as grounds for dismissal of a complaint, need to be distinguished."

The Court of Appeals noted that "Length may make a complaint unintelligible, by scattering and concealing in a morass of irrelevancies the few allegations that matter." However, "a complaint may be long not because the draftsman is incompetent or is seeking to obfuscate ('serving up a muddle' to the judge, as such complaints are sometimes described)." Rather, it may be lengthy, like Kadamovas' complaint, because it contains a large number of distinct claims.

"District judges are busy, and therefore have a right to dismiss a complaint that is so long that it imposes an undue burden on the judge, to the prejudice of other litigants seeking the judge's attention," the appellate court observed; however, "surplusage can and should be ignored."

While "one doesn't need 99 pages to make" Kadamovas' allegations, "the complaint isn't in fact 99 pages long, as the district judge thought," the Seventh Circuit wrote. "It's 28 pages long, the last 71 pages being an appendix, which the judge could have stricken without bothering to read."

As used in Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a)(2), "short'... is a relative term," the Court of Appeals found. "Brevity must be calibrated to the number of claims and also to their character." Given the Supreme Court's requirement that a complaint establish plausibility of its claims pursuant to Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937 (2009) [PLN, July 2009, p.18], the appellate court observed that "complaints are likely to be longer – and legitimately so – than" before the ruling in Iqbal.

Noting that "unintelligibility is distinct from length, and often unrelated to it," the Court of Appeals determined that "far from being unintelligible, the complaint in this case ... is not only entirely intelligible; it is clear."

The Court found that "the complaint charges that in retaliation for the plaintiff's going on hunger strikes, the defendants used excessive force to force feed him and extract blood samples from him, placed him in a cell infested with feces, denied him minimal recreational opportunities, refused to allow him to have a Bible, refused to allow him to file grievances, and tried to block his access to the federal courts."

The Seventh Circuit thus concluded that Kadamovas' complaint did "not violate any principle of federal pleading," and remanded the case for further proceedings. See: Kadamovas v. Stevens, 706 F.3d 843 (7th Cir. 2013).

Following remand, on September 30, 2013 the district court granted in part and denied in part the defendants' motion for summary judgment, finding that portions of Kadamovas' personal declaration were inadmissible because they contained hearsay and "legal assertions, arguments, conclusions, or conjecture not otherwise supported by admissible evidence." The court granted summary judgment or judgment as a matter of law to the defendants on most of the claims, but declined to do so on a claim alleging that one defendant was deliberately indifferent to Kadamovas' serious medical needs.

The district court appointed counsel to represent Kadamovas in November 2013, and this case remains pending. See: Kadamovas v. Lockett, U.S.D.C. (S.D. Ind.), Case No. 2:11-cv-00015-WTL-DKL; 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 141795. ■

California Improves Compensation Process for Wrongfully Convicted Prisoners

ON OCTOBER 13, 2013, CALIFORNIA Governor Jerry Brown signed into law Senate Bill 618, legislation that streamlines the process for providing financial compensation to people who are wrongfully convicted, exonerated and released from prison. The bill had been introduced by state Senator Mark Leno.

SB 618 updates California Penal Code 4900, enacted in 2000, which provides for $100 for each day of incarceration resulting from a wrongful conviction. The law also required exonerated prisoners to undergo a second, smaller trial by a compensation board to establish their innocence.

SB 618 mandates two important changes. First, when a judge grants a writ of habeas corpus, those findings are binding on the compensation board; second, prisoners who are exonerated and freed no longer have to go through another hearing to prove their innocence before obtaining compensation.

The purpose of modifying the existing law is to provide more expedient relief to wrongfully convicted prisoners like Timothy Atkins.

Convicted at age 17 and incarcerated for 23 years for a murder he did not commit, Atkins was released in February 2007 after the state's witness admitted being coerced by police to name him as the perpetrator.

Regardless, he was denied compensation in 2010 because the compensation hearing board did not believe he had established his innocence "by a preponderance of the evidence," even though that same evidence had been used to reverse his conviction and set him free.

From 2000 to 2011, only 11 of 132 wrongfully convicted prisoners in California received financial compensation from the state. Their payments ranged from $17,200 to $756,900.

SB 618 was championed by the American Civil Liberties Union, the California Innocence Project and the Northern California Innocence Project.

"The goal of the compensation law is to enable wrongfully convicted people to get back on their feet," said California Innocence Project director Justin Brooks. "The prior compensation process disrespected judicial decisions by giving no deference to them when deciding if a person had been wrongfully convicted. It also allowed for a long and drawn out process. The new law is just, makes sense, and saves both time and money."

SB 618 streamlines the compensation process by concentrating the compensation board's attention on claims that require evaluation while allowing automatic approval of claims where a prisoner's innocence has already been established. Further, it ensures that board rulings on compensation petitions will be based on the same facts and rules of evidence considered by the court that reversed a prisoner's conviction and granted his or her release.

The law will benefit wrongfully convicted California prisoners like Daniel Larson, who was exonerated on January 27, 2014 after prosecutors dismissed the charges against him following a federal court ruling that found he was actually innocent. Larson had been convicted of possession of a concealed weapon and sentenced to 28 years to life under the state's three-strikes law. He served 14 years in prison.

Meanwhile, Timothy Atkins has appealed the initial rejection of his compensation claim. "I lost 23 years of my life for something I didn't do. I didn't give up while I was in prison. And I am most definitely not going to give up now," he stated. ■

North Dakota Courtroom Shackling Requires Independent Assessment by Judge

by Mark Wilson

THE NORTH DAKOTA SUPREME COURT has held that a lower court abused its discretion by failing to independently assess the need for shackling a defendant during a civil commitment discharge hearing.

On January 11, 2006, Robert R. Hoff was civilly committed as a sexually dangerous person. He requested discharge in September 2011 and appeared at a March 2012 discharge hearing while in "handcuffs tethered to his waist and an ankle chain."

Hoff's attorney requested that the shackles be removed, but the court refused. "The sheriff makes the determination whether or not [defendants] can be secured while they're here," the court explained.

"Not my call, Your Honor," a deputy stated. "The sheriff said no. They have to stay on."

At the conclusion of the hearing the court denied Hoff a discharge, finding that he "continues to be a sexually dangerous individual."

The state Supreme Court reversed, holding that "when Hoff's counsel requested that Hoff's restraints be removed, at a minimum, the court was required to engage in the analysis set out in" Interest of R.W.S., 2007 ND 37, 728 N.W.2d 326 (N.D. 2007). The trial court's failure to do so was not harmless error; this was true even though the hearing was of a civil nature, not criminal, and there was no jury.

On remand, the lower court "must consider on the record the factors established in R.W.S. ... to determine if it is necessary to restrain Hoff" during the discharge hearing, the Supreme Court wrote. "If the court determines restraints are not necessary, it must conduct a new hearing free of restraints." See: In re Hoff, 2013 ND 68, 830 N.W.2d 608 (N.D. 2013).

Following remand, the trial court found that Hoff remained a sexually dangerous person. Hoff petitioned for another discharge in 2013; his petition was denied and he again appealed. The North Dakota Supreme Court reversed again on April 3, 2014, finding that the lower court had "made insufficient findings of fact on whether Hoff has difficulty controlling his behavior." The Court remanded the case "for detailed findings of fact and conclusions of law on each legal element supporting the district court's decision to deny Hoff's petition for discharge." See: In re Hoff, 2014 ND 63 (N.D. 2014). ■

States Renewing Their Prison Phone Contracts

As state DOCs renew or rebid their prison phone contracts, you can help urge them to lower intrastate phone rates and eliminate commission kickbacks!

The Campaign for Prison Phone Justice needs your help in:

**** North Carolina, South Dakota and Virginia ******

The Departments of Corrections in the above states are in the process of re-bidding or renewing their prison phone contracts. Most DOCs receive a commission (kickback) on revenue generated from calls made by prisoners, which results in excessively high phone rates. Although the FCC voted last year to cap the costs of interstate (long distance) prison calls, which went into effect on February 11, 2014, the order does not apply to intrastate (in-state) calls; an estimated 85% of prison phone calls are in-state. This is an opportunity to ask DOCs to forgo commissions and ensure their new prison phone contracts are based on the lowest cost to those who pay for the calls – mostly prisoners' families.

Take Action NOW! Here's What YOU Can Do!

Ask your family members and friends to write, email, call and fax the DOC and the governor's office (addresses and contacts are listed below), requesting that the DOC: 1) forgo commission payments when re-bidding or renewing its prison phone contract, and 2) base the new contract on the lowest calling costs. Lower prison phone rates should apply not just to long distance calls but also to in-state calls. For a sample letter or to easily send an email, visit the Campaign for Prison Phone Justice's website and click on the "Take Action" tab:

Florida Prison System Ordered to Provide Kosher Meals

A U.S. DISTRICT COURT HAS ORDERED the Florida Department of Corrections (FDOC) to begin serving kosher meals to hundreds of Jewish prisoners, following legal challenges after the FDOC discontinued its kosher meal program in 2007. Additionally, an Islamic advocacy group has warned that it is prepared to file suit if the FDOC fails to provide halal food to Muslim prisoners.

The legal fight for kosher meals began in September 2010 when Florida state prisoner Bruce Rich, an Orthodox Jew, filed a complaint in federal court under the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), claiming the FDOC's refusal to provide a kosher diet violated his right to practice his religion.

At the time, Florida prisons offered three main diets: 1) the master menu, 2) an alternate entree with a non-meat substitute and 3) vegan meals. None were kosher. The FDOC also provides therapeutic diets prescribed by a doctor and had previously eliminated all pork and pork products from prison meals.

The U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) joined the fray in August 2012, filing a lawsuit against the FDOC that alleged the state was in violation of RLUIPA by failing to accommodate prisoners' requests for kosher meals.

A federal district court granted the DOJ's motion for a preliminary injunction on December 6, 2013, ordering Florida prison officials to begin serving kosher meals by July 1, 2014.

The state had previously announced it would begin providing kosher meals, and that a Religious Diet Program would start in April 2013 at the Union Correctional Institution, where Rich was housed, then be implemented statewide in September 2013. However, the rollout of the program was delayed.

Under the Religious Diet Program, the FDOC was to provide certified pre-packaged kosher foods to prisoners whose religious dietary needs cannot be satisfied by other meal options. Prisoners must first pass a religious sincerity test, which includes "eat[ing] from the alternate entree or vegan meal pattern" for up to ninety days."

The FDOC argued that its Religious Diet Program mooted the legal challenges related to kosher meals, but the Eleventh Circuit disagreed in a May 2013 decision in Rich's case. The appellate court noted that the FDOC's policy change came "late in the game," and only after Rich had filed his brief and after the DOJ filed suit.

The Court of Appeals further noted the FDOC said it would initially implement the Religious Diet Program solely at the prison where Rich was housed, less than two weeks prior to oral argument in his appeal. "These facts," wrote the Eleventh Circuit, "make it appear that the change in policy is 'an attempt to manipulate jurisdiction.'"

The appellate court also said there was nothing to suggest the FDOC would not simply end the new program sometime in the future, as it ended the kosher meal program it had operated from 2004 to 2007. See: Rich v. FDOC, 716 F.3d 525 (11th Cir. 2013).

The kosher meal program that was offered by the FDOC starting in 2004 provided meals for prisoners deemed eligible through a screening process that measured the sincerity of their religious convictions. The program served prisoners of the Jewish, Islamic and Seventh Day Adventist faiths.

In April 2007, the FDOC commissioned a study group to review the program. The study group found several challenges associated with offering kosher meals, including adhering to the laws of kashruth, the set of Jewish dietary laws which prescribes religiously acceptable sources of food and methods of food preparation.

To be kosher, a food item must derive from religiously acceptable sources, be stored in kosher containers, be prepared in a particular manner and be served on tableware that has not contacted non-kosher food. In addition, meat and dairy products may not be mixed.

The study group also found that while there was an additional cost to provide kosher meals, the program was essential to allow prisoners to exercise their religious obligations. Citing in part the cost, the FDOC ended its system-wide kosher meal program in 2007 after receiving the study group's report.

The DOJ's lawsuit contends that the FDOC is capable of providing kosher meals to prisoners consistent with its compelling governmental interests. The DOJ noted that the federal Bureau of Prisons and 34 other states provide kosher food to prisoners.

"Most states do provide kosher diets, even Texas where there are about 25-30 Jewish inmates," observed Eric Rassbach, an attorney for the Becket Fund for Religious Liberty. "Of the remaining states that don't, they tend not to be the ones with a big Jewish population."

One of the FDOC's arguments against implementing kosher meals was that many more prisoners than expected had requested the meals, and there was no way to adequately determine which prisoners are sincere and which are simply trying to take advantage of kosher food that is considered fresher and more palatable than regular prison fare.

While FDOC officials had expected around 300 prisoners to sign up for kosher meals, they received more than 4,400 requests following the district court's December 2013 order granting the DOJ's motion for a preliminary injunction, according to a news report in the Tampa Bay Times. "The last number I saw ... was 4,417," FDOC Secretary Michael D. Crews told a state Senate committee. "Once they start having the meals, we could see the number balloon."

Gary Friedman, who chairs Jewish Prisoner Services International, said kosher meals appeal to both Jewish and non-Jewish prisoners alike. "Inmates have a lot of paranoia about what they are being fed," he stated. "If they are using prepackaged, sealed meals, the inmates believe they are safer."

However, the cost of such meals is much higher. Crews told the Senate committee that three regular meals for state prisoners cost $1.52 per day, while only two kosher meals cost at least $4.00 per day.

The Eleventh Circuit said such concerns were unfounded in its May 2013 ruling in Rich's appeal, holding that the state's cost estimates were "unsupported" and that purported security concerns were "speculative." Following remand, Rich voluntarily dismissed his lawsuit against the FDOC without prejudice on February 10, 2014.

An Islamic rights group, meanwhile, has said that if the FDOC is going to serve kosher meals to Jewish prisoners then the state also needs to provide halal food for Muslim prisoners.

"It is only fair and equitable that if Jewish inmates receive kosher food, as they should, that Muslim inmates have access to halal meals," said Hassan Shibly, executive director of the Florida chapter of the Council on American-Islamic Relations, in a January 2014 press release.

"We have been trying to amicably resolve these issues for 2½ years to avoid a lawsuit but will be taking legal action within the next year if they do not comply," he stated.

The DOJ's lawsuit against the FDOC, which seeks declaratory and injunctive relief, remains pending; Florida officials have since appealed the district court's preliminary injunction order. The FDOC moved to stay the order pending resolution of the appeal, but the motion was denied. See: United States v. Secretary, Florida Department of Corrections, U.S.D.C. (S.D. Fla.), Case No. 1:12-cv-22958. ■

Ninth Circuit: County May be Liable for Wrongful Conviction Even if District Attorney Enjoys Absolute Immunity

ON MAY 8, 2013, THE NINTH Circuit Court of Appeals held that the County of Los Angeles could be held liable for its failure to establish policies regarding the use of jailhouse informants, when that failure led to the wrongful conviction of Thomas Lee Goldstein, a man with no prior criminal history, who served over two decades in prison for a murder he didn't commit.

In so holding, the Ninth Circuit reversed the district court's grant of the county's motion for judgment on the pleadings. The district court's ruling, in turn, followed a decision by the U.S. Supreme Court four years earlier, which had held that the Los Angeles County District Attorney enjoyed absolute immunity from suit based on Goldstein's claims.

Goldstein, a Marine Corps veteran and engineering student, was convicted of a 1979 murder based largely on the perjured testimony of an unreliable jailhouse informant, the aptly named Edward Fink. Although Fink had a history of testifying in other cases in exchange for reduced sentences, no one informed Goldstein's counsel of Fink's history or that Fink had lied on the stand when he denied having such a history.

In 1998, Goldstein filed a petition for habeas relief in federal court. After conducting an evidentiary hearing, the district court found the prosecution had failed to disclose impeachment material to Goldstein's defense counsel and that the error had prejudiced him. Given the option of retrying Goldstein, the state chose to release him instead. He had served 24 years.

Goldstein then filed suit against Los Angeles County and the District Attorney pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983, alleging that his civil rights had been violated by their failure to create an information system containing potential impeachment material related to informants.

In Van de Kamp v. Goldstein, 555 U.S. 335 (2009), the U.S. Supreme Court held that the District Attorney was absolutely immune from Goldstein's claims because those claims focused on administrative procedures "directly connected with the conduct of a trial." [See: PLN, March 2009, p.26].

On remand, the district court entered judgment in favor of the District Attorney, then "reluctantly" granted the county's motion for judgment on the pleadings.

The Ninth Circuit reversed on appeal, rejecting the county's argument that the Supreme Court's decision in Van de Kamp was determinative of the outcome of the case. In so ruling, the appellate court distinguished the role of the District Attorney as a prosecutor – an agent of the state entitled to absolute immunity – from the role of the District Attorney as an administrative policymaker for the county.

Specifically, the Court of Appeals concluded that California district attorneys "act as local policymakers when adopting and implementing internal policies and procedures related to the use of jailhouse informants." Accordingly, Goldstein's claims against Los Angeles County could proceed and the case was remanded to the district court.

The Ninth Circuit noted that its conclusion would vary "from state to state" depending on an analysis of underlying state law with respect to whether prosecutors act on behalf of the state or counties, for purposes of determining immunity.

Circuit Judge Stephen Reinhardt issued a concurring opinion in which he expounded on Edward Fink's repeated history of providing false informant testimony in exchange for reduced sentences, including in the death penalty case of Thomas Thompson, a California prisoner who was executed in 1998.

The Supreme Court denied Los Angeles County's petition for writ of certiorari, and this case remains pending before the district court with a trial date scheduled in October 2014. See: Goldstein v. City of Long Beach, 715 F.3d 750 (9th Cir. Cal. 2013), cert. denied. ■

California: Sexually Violent Predators May be Conditionally Released from Custody Even if Homeless

by Michael Brodheim

THE CALIFORNIA COURT OF APPEAL, Third District, has held that a person committed as a sexually violent predator (SVP) may be conditionally released into the community even if he or she has no fixed residence.

In October 2010, the Placer County Superior Court determined that Tibor Karsai, who had been committed as an SVP in 1998, would pose no danger to others under outpatient supervision and treatment in the community, and that he therefore should be conditionally released. A year and a half later, despite the fact that an acceptable residence for Karsai had not been found, the court ordered his release.

Arguing that no provision of law permits an SVP to be released as a transient without a fixed residence, the District Attorney sought a writ of mandate to prevent Karsai's release. The Court of Appeal rejected that argument, however, concluding that "nothing in the law forbids conditional release of an SVP as a transient." To hold otherwise, the appellate court wrote, would raise serious constitutional concerns.

Once a trial court determines that an SVP would not pose a danger to others – if under supervision and treatment in the community, as required by statute – the SVP "unquestionably has a significant liberty interest in being released." Delaying that release due to lack of post-release housing "would run the risk that a person who is no longer dangerous will nonetheless have to remain in custody in a secure facility indefinitely simply because of some extraneous factor, such as public outrage, that interferes with finding and securing a fixed residence for that person," the Court of Appeal wrote. See: People v. Superior Court (Karsai), 213 Cal. App. 4th 774 (Cal. App. 3d Dist. 2013), review denied. ■

Banking and Financial Management Course (1st Ed.), by Prisoner Assistant

(CreateSpace Independent Publishing, July 2013). 119 pages, $30.00

Book review by Gary Hunter

LIFE OUTSIDE PRISON CROSSES THE minds of most prisoners daily, but how many times do those thoughts include the direction of their financial future? Prisoner Assistant has put together a helpful text book, the Banking and Financial Management Course, specifically designed to help prisoners understand and plan for their future finances.

Banking and Financial Management offers a detailed description of how financial institutions operate and how they can be successfully used. The reader will learn the subtle differences between a debit card, credit card and ATM card, for example. The book also describes a number of fee-based financial services offered by Prisoner Assistant.

Chapter one addresses banking basics with a concise explanation of what financial institutions offer and how they work. Debit card and credit card functions are clearly explained. Prisoner Assistant even provides a list of questions that will help you find the financial institution best suited to your personal needs.

Chapter two examines savings accounts, and illustrations take the reader through an easy to understand, step-by-step process. Technological advances now offer everyone a variety of ways to access their funds once they are deposited in a financial institution.

Debit cards and online banking save people time and money when it comes to shopping and paying bills. Banking and Financial Management explains these options and the good and bad points of each. It also discusses how to reverse the effects of a negative credit history that may disqualify you from doing business at certain banks.

Chapter three covers checking accounts, which have changed dramatically over the years. While people still use paper checks, money is more often managed with debit cards. A debit card allows the card holder to shop, pay bills or get cash without the hassle of writing a check, though there are also disadvantages.

Automatic Teller Machines (ATMs) are everywhere; they are the bank's way of making it easy for you to access the money in your account. But convenience is seldom free, even when the money belongs to you, and Prisoner Assistant's detailed book describes the hidden costs of accessing your money through ATMs.

Further, Banking and Financial Management will teach you how to read bank statements, perform online banking transactions and manage checking accounts to avoid penalties that result from overdrafts.

Because almost 85% of identity theft occurs through the theft of paper documents, banks now offer their customers the security of online banking services. Online banking also allows the convenience of 24/7 access to your money and lets you view, print and download bank statements anywhere.

Mobile banking – i.e., banking from your phone – is another option. Prisoner Assistant informs the reader about mobile banking services and other ways you can manage your finances in today's technologically-advanced world.

Chapter five is arguably the most important chapter, as it teaches the fundamentals of how to budget your money. Banking and Financial Management breaks down budgeting into three fundamental steps: establishing a budget, using your budget and creating an emergency fund.

Basic budgeting consists of balancing income and expenses, and Prisoner Assistant explains budget basics with complete instructions whether you prefer to use pencil and paper or computer spreadsheets. Banking and Financial Management will help you understand the differences between fixed and variable expenses, for example.

Credit cards and credit history can make or break your plans for financial success. In chapter six, Prisoner Assistant covers the importance of credit, how to qualify for credit and how not to get caught in traps that can ruin your credit rating. You will learn about credit reports, credit scores and how to build a strong credit history.

Chapter seven covers loans, while chapter eight addresses credit cards. Both discuss how to avoid paying high interest rates; different types of interest and interest rates play a major role in determining what kinds of loans and credit cards are best for you.

For the reasonable price of $30.00, this highly informative text, complete with illustrations and end-of-chapter exams, can help prisoners learn how to manage their money and achieve financial success. In addition to this book, Prisoner Assistant offers a variety of fee-based services to assist prisoners in preparing for their financial future while incarcerated, such as opening accounts and building a credit history.

The Banking and Financial Management Course is available from Prisoner Assistant (www.prisonerassistant.com), or from online booksellers such as Amazon.

Seventh Circuit Clarifies Standard for Recruiting Counsel in Pro Se Cases

by David Reutter

THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT COURT OF Appeals has held that an Illinois federal district court, like many federal courts in Northern Illinois, used an improper standard when refusing to exercise its discretion to recruit counsel for a pro se prisoner in a civil rights action. The appellate court further found the prisoner was prejudiced by the refusal to recruit counsel.

While at the Stateville Correctional Center in 2008, prisoner Eduardo Navejar was ordered out of the cafeteria line by Lt. Akinola Iyiola for violating prison rules that prohibit prisoners being transported from stopping to speak to other prisoners. Navejar disobeyed the order, became belligerent and punched Iyiola in the face.

Iyiola and other guards wrestled Navejar to the ground and handcuffed him. From that point on, the facts were disputed. Navejar testified that Iyiola kicked him in the forehead near his eye and an unidentified guard stomped his head against the ground. Navejar was then pepper-sprayed by Sgt. Michael Grant.

After Navejar was dragged along the floor and carried down some stairs, Iyiola again pepper-sprayed him. Guards then left Navejar in a segregation cell for a half-hour, screaming in pain, before allowing him to wash off the pepper spray.

The next morning Navejar was in the medical unit awaiting examination when Lt. Glen Elbersen removed him and told him that he was being transferred to the Pontiac Correctional Center. A doctor later concluded, after administering X-rays, that Navejar suffered only bruises and scratches.

Navejar was found guilty of four disciplinary charges stemming from the incident; his appeal and grievance claiming excessive force were denied. He then sued Iyiola, Grant, Elbersen and other unnamed guards. The district court ignored two motions filed by Navejar seeking pro-bono counsel, and denied two similar motions. The court then granted summary judgment to the defendants.

On appeal, the Seventh Circuit found the district court's denial of Navejar's motions was based on a legal standard that preceded its en banc ruling in Pruitt v. Mote, 503 F.3d 647 (7th Cir. 2007), which refined the standards for evaluating whether to recruit counsel. Under Pruitt, if a plaintiff makes a reasonable attempt to secure an attorney, the district court must examine "whether the difficulty of the case – factually and legally – exceeds the particular plaintiff's capacity as a lay person to coherently present it."

The inquiry does not focus, as the district court had held, solely on the plaintiff's ability to try the case; it also includes other tasks that "normally attend litigation," such as "evidence gathering" and "preparing and responding to motions." Further, the district court improperly considered whether recruiting counsel would affect the case's outcome. That inquiry, the Court of Appeals held, "is reserved for the appellate court's review for prejudice." The Seventh Circuit found more than 100 cases from the Northern District of Illinois that had improperly relied on pre-Pruitt case law.

Finally, the appellate court held that Navejar was prejudiced as a result of the district court's refusal to recruit counsel, because counsel would have responded to the defendants' arguments that the district court should disregard Navejar's "self-serving evidence" and that his excessive force claims were barred by Heck v. Humphrey, 512 U.S. 477 (1984). Both arguments, which were accepted by the district court, constituted "substantive errors."

Accordingly, the case was reversed and remanded for further proceedings. See: Navejar v. Iyiola, 718 F.3d 692 (7th Cir. 2013). Following remand the district court appointed counsel to represent Navejar, and the parties entered into settlement discussions in April 2014. ■

Second Circuit: Federal Prisoner States Conditions of Confinement Claim

by David Reutter

THE COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE Second Circuit held that a federal prisoner sufficiently stated a claim alleging the conditions of his confinement violated the Eighth Amendment.

The case involved an appeal from a New York federal district court's order granting a motion to dismiss filed by defendant prison officials. The district court held that FCI Ray Brook prisoner Ellis Walker had failed to present facts to support his claim that conditions at the facility constituted cruel and unusual punishment.

Walker alleged that for 28 months he was held in a cell with five other men. The cell had "inadequate space and ventilation, stifling heat in the summer and freezing cold in the winter," unsanitary conditions that included urine and feces splattered on the floor, insufficient cleaning supplies and a mattress too narrow for him to lie down on flat. Walker also claimed the cell was noisy and crowded, which made sleep difficult, and that he was at constant risk of violence and serious harm from his cellmates.

The Second Circuit held that those allegations plausibly stated a claim for cruel and unusual punishment. First, the appellate court said it was well settled that exposing prisoners to extreme temperatures without adequate ventilation may constitute a constitutional violation.

Next, the Court of Appeals noted that sleep is critical to human existence, and conditions which prevent sleep have been held to violate the Eighth Amendment. "Further, at least one court recently found that the condition of a prisoner's mattress may be so inadequate as to constitute an unconstitutional violation," the appellate court wrote.

Third, it has long been recognized that unsanitary conditions in a prison cell, under egregious circumstances, can rise to the level of cruel and unusual punishment. Such conditions lasting for "mere days" could reach that level.

The failure to provide prisoners with toiletries and other hygiene supplies also can be unconstitutional, as can conditions that place prisoners at a "substantial risk of harm." The Court of Appeals found that Walker had pled sufficient facts to defeat a motion to dismiss, which treats all factual allegations as true, by plausibly alleging "conditions that, perhaps alone and certainly in combination, deprived him of a minimal civilized measure of life's necessities."

The Second Circuit held the district court had improperly "assay[ed] the weight of the evidence" and had erred in finding that Walker, who was proceeding pro se, was required to indicate "the exact extent or duration of [his] exposure to unsanitary conditions" and the temperatures in his cell. It had also erred in dismissing Walker's overcrowding claim by finding the 29 square feet allotted to each prisoner in his six-man cell had been judicially sanctioned in other cases.

The Court of Appeals concluded that Walker was entitled to develop a factual record to support his claims, and that he had adequately alleged the defendants knew about and disregarded the excessive risks to his health and safety at FCI Ray Brook. The Second Circuit declined to address the defendants' argument that they were entitled to qualified immunity. The district court's order of dismissal was vacated and the case remanded for further proceedings, where it remains pending. See: Walker v. Schult, 717 F.3d 119 (2d Cir. 2013). ■

Witness Protection Program Termination Unreviewable; 188 Days in SHU Triggers Due Process Protections

by Mark Wilson

THE SECOND CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS has held that claims related to termination from a federal witness protection program are not judicially reviewable. The Court reinstated an administrative segregation claim, however, holding that 188 days in segregation triggered due process protections.

A federal prisoner incarcerated at FCI Otisville in New York, identified only as "J.S.," voluntarily participated in the U.S. Department of Justice's (DOJ) Witness Security Program, also known as the witness protection program, from December 2007 to March 2010 pursuant to a "prisoner-witness agreement" and a memorandum of understanding with the DOJ.

Upon entering the program, J.S. agreed that contacting or attempting to contact unauthorized individuals could result in his termination from the program.

In October 2009, DOJ officials informed J.S. that he had violated the agreement by contacting unauthorized individuals, and a program termination notice was issued.

J.S. administratively appealed the termination, arguing that the DOJ's failure to provide him with notice of whom he allegedly contacted deprived him of due process. He also claimed the alleged violation was impossible because prison staff approved all of his contacts.

On April 19, 2010, prison unit manager Donna Hill served J.S. with a copy of the DOJ order denying his appeal. The DOJ "doesn't have to go by the same rules as everybody else," Hill said when J.S. again objected to the lack of notice regarding whom he had allegedly contacted. "They don't have to tell you what you did, you know what you did."

Hill instructed J.S. to initial the order. After he did so, he was immediately confined in the prison's Security Housing Unit (SHU) for 188 days.

J.S. filed a Bivens action alleging that his witness protection program termination and SHU confinement were unconstitutional. The district court dismissed the action sua sponte, holding that it lacked subject-matter jurisdiction because 18 U.S.C. § 3521(f) states that witness protection program termination decisions "shall not be subject to judicial review."

The Second Circuit upheld the dismissal of the termination claim, agreeing that § 3521(f) bars judicial review of such termination decisions and Congress did not create a property interest in participation in the witness protection program. In the latter regard, J.S. was "unable to show that he has been deprived of a property right for which process is due because a benefit is not a protected entitlement if government officials may grant or deny it in their discretion."

The appellate court reversed the dismissal of J.S.'s SHU claim, however, concluding with "little difficulty" that "188 days of administrative confinement is sufficient to implicate Sandin-type liberty interests," referring to the due process standard set forth in Sandin v. Conner, 115 S.Ct. 2293 (1995) [PLN, Aug. 1995, p.1]. The Court of Appeals also found that J.S. should be allowed on remand to replead his claim, not included in his original complaint, "that his confinement [in the SHU] was not merely administrative but was punitive because it was intended to punish his breach of the Program agreement...."

In a concurring opinion, two Second Circuit judges made "the troubling observation that Congress has created procedural guarantees for Witness Security Program ... participants which when violated, as they appear to have been here, give rise to no judicial remedy." They expressed hope "that Congress may choose to review and audit compliance with, or even revise, 18 U.S.C. § 3521 to provide greater enforcement of the procedural protections it intended Program participants to have." The dissenting judges also directed the court clerk to send a copy of the opinion to the DOJ's Office of the Inspector General for review.

The case was remanded so J.S. could replead his SHU claim, while the dismissal of the program termination claim was affirmed. See: J.S. v. T'Kach, 714 F.3d 99 (2d Cir. 2013). ■

Former Colorado DOC Official Pleads Guilty to Felony Menacing Charges

EX-COLORADO PRISON OFFICIAL MARK Edward McKinna, 63, pleaded guilty in May 2013 to six counts of felony menacing with a deadly weapon.

McKinna, once a regional director for the Colorado Department of Corrections who served as warden at the Fremont, Limon and Territorial correctional facilities, admitted discharging a firearm at six people – five of them children – near a neighbor's home in Cañon City.

The incident occurred when Charlene Cornwell's then-14-year-old daughter and another girl were outside riding the family's go-kart. According to a probable cause affidavit, McKinna exited his house and began cursing at them due to the noise.

He reportedly continued using profanity at Cornwell, the two girls and three other children even after they turned off the go-kart. McKinna then pulled a gun from his pocket and fired a shot in their direction.

Cañon City police responded to the August 2012 incident and one officer testified that he smelled alcohol on McKinna, who had slurred speech, watery eyes and was off-balance.

McKinna accepted a plea bargain and was sentenced to 10 days in jail and three years' probation on July 17, 2013. While on probation he will not be allowed to possess firearms, other deadly weapons, alcohol or non-prescription drugs. Further, he must write an apology to each of the victims, obtain a mental health evaluation and stay away from the Cornwell family.

The state court rejected the prosecution's request for an 18-month sentence, citing McKinna's "exemplary" character and career as a prison official. McKinna's defense attorney said the sentence was a reasonable outcome. ■

Warden Granted Qualified Immunity for Two-year Visitation Suspension

by David Reutter

A PRISON OFFICIAL WHO SUSPENDED A prisoner's visitation privileges was entitled to qualified immunity because, under the facts of the case, the prisoner did not have a clearly established right to visitation, the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals held.

South Carolina state prisoner Jerome A. Williams received a visitor at the Evans Correctional Institution on March 31, 2007. During the visit, a guard observed the visitor "pass suspected marijuana to Williams," who reportedly placed it in his pants before walking to the restroom.

Several guards intercepted Williams. He was taken to an area to be strip searched while his visitor was escorted out of the prison. No contraband was found, but a guard said he saw Williams put something in his mouth and swallow. As a result, Williams was placed in a "dry cell" for 72 hours. His excrement was searched for the suspected marijuana, without success. He was not charged with a disciplinary offense.

Despite the lack of contraband, Williams was held in a disciplinary "special housing unit" for a little over two months. Additionally, the warden suspended Williams' visitation privileges for two years based on the guard's observations. The visitation privileges of Williams' visitor were suspended for two years, too, but that was not at issue in the case.

Williams filed a civil rights action in December 2008 that alleged several constitutional violations. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants on his visitation suspension claim, which was one of the claims at issue before the Fourth Circuit (other claims went to a jury trial, which found in favor of the defendants).

The appellate court noted that Williams had failed to cite any cases clearly establishing a constitutional right to visitation grounded in the First, Fourth or Fourteenth Amendments. Thus, "We conclude that the prison warden who imposed the [visitation suspension] is shielded by qualified immunity from the inmate's claim for monetary damages because, under the facts presented here, the inmate did not have a clearly established constitutional right to visitation."

The Fourth Circuit noted that in Overton v. Bazzetta, 539 U.S. 126 (2003) [PLN, Oct. 2003, p.18], the U.S. Supreme Court had rejected a prisoner's claim that a two-year visitation suspension constituted cruel and unusual punishment. The Supreme Court did, however, acknowledge that an Eighth Amendment analysis might differ if visitation privileges were denied permanently "or for a 'much longer period,' or 'in an arbitrary manner to a particular inmate.'"

The appellate court also found that Williams' complaint failed to state a declaratory judgment claim challenging the visitation suspension policy, and since his visitation privileges had since been restored he was not entitled to injunctive relief. The Court of Appeals further held the case did not fall within the narrow exception to the mootness doctrine.

The district court's summary judgment order was therefore affirmed; Williams petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari, which was denied on February 24, 2014. See: Williams v. Ozmint, 716 F.3d 801 (4th Cir. 2013), cert. denied. ■

Massachusetts: Order Relieving Sex Offender of Registration Not Vacated Upon Probation Violation

by David Reutter

THE MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL Court has held that once a judge relieves a sex offender of the requirement to register, a different judge lacks the authority to order the offender to register following a probation violation.

Douglas Ventura pleaded guilty to one count of possession of child pornography. After being sentenced to probation, pursuant to state law he moved to be relieved of the statutory requirement to register as a sex offender. The sentencing judge found that Ventura had demonstrated he did not pose a risk of re-offense or a danger to the public, and relieved him of the registration requirement.

About two-and-a-half years later, in September 2010, Ventura was charged with accosting and annoying a person of the opposite sex. At his probation revocation hearing, it was established that Ventura had watched two of his daughters' friends through a hole in the shower wall of his home's guest bathroom, which they used when they stayed at his house during overnight visits.

Ventura's probation was revoked and he was sentenced to one year in prison and three years of probation on the new charge. As part of the sentence, the judge ordered him to register as a sex offender.

On appeal, the Supreme Judicial Court said the original charge of possession of child pornography qualified as a sex offense, but the charge of accosting and annoying a person of the opposite sex did not. Registration is a collateral consequence for convicted sex offenders; however, "Nothing in the act confers authority on a judge to impose an obligation to register as a condition of probation."

The Court held the Sex Offender Registry Act allows a judge in certain circumstances to relieve a sex offender from the registration requirement, but does not permit a judge to order such registration. "It follows that the second judge may not, as part of the sentence imposed following probation revocation, impose a registration requirement as a condition of the probationary portion of that sentence."

The Supreme Court rejected the state's position that upon a violation of probation the prior order relieving Ventura of the registration requirement was vacated. Simply put, the Court found there was no statutory support for that position, saying the state's "strained parsing of the statutory text" was "untenable." Thus, the trial court's order requiring Ventura to register as a sex offender was reversed. See: Commonwealth v. Ventura, 465 Mass. 202, 987 N.E.2d 1266 (Mass. 2013). ■

NOTICE OF PROPOSED SETTLEMENT OF CLASS ACTION LAWSUIT CONCERNING CENSORSHIP OF MATERIALS MAILED TO INDIVIDUALS IN THE CUSTODY OF THE MISSOURI DEPARTMENT OF CORRECTIONS

This notice gives information about the settlement of a lawsuit challenging how the Missouri Department of Corrections censors material that is mailed to individuals who are in its custody.

BACKGROUND

In August 2012, a lawsuit, Lane d/b/a Caged Potential v. Lombardi, No. 12-4219, was brought claiming that the Missouri Department of Corrections was not giving notice of censorship decisions and an opportunity to appeal to senders of material mailed to individuals in its custody. The lawsuit claims that failing to provide senders of censored materials notice of censorship and non-delivery and failing to provide an opportunity to appeal censorship decisions violates the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution.

In November 2012, the court certified the case as a class action.

The parties have now agreed to a settlement in the case, which must be approved by the court.

PROPOSED SETTLEMENT

You can see the entire proposed settlement at the website for the plaintiffs' counsel: American Civil Liberties Union of Missouri Foundation, <http://www.aclu-mo.org/legal-docket/bobbie-lane-v-modoc/>.

The plaintiff class consists of "All current and future publishers, distributors, and authors of written materials, who mail books, publications, or other written materials to inmates incarcerated in prisons operated by the Missouri Department of Corrections."

The basic terms of the settlement are:

- Publications received in the mail and thought to violate censorship guidelines will now be reviewed by the censorship committee before any censorship occurs. Furthermore, the sender of publications that are censored will receive written notice of the decision and will have the opportunity to appeal the censorship. Within 30 days of receipt of the appeal, the division director or designee of equal or higher ranking will respond to the appeal. The Chief Administrative Officer will be advised of the decision.
- Recorded materials and personal correspondence will not be reviewed by a committee before censorship; however, the senders of such materials that are censored will be given notice of the decision and the opportunity to appeal.
- The defendants will pay the plaintiffs' counsel $33,479.45 to reimburse litigation expenses and in attorneys' fees.

RIGHT TO OBJECT

Any class member has the right to let the court, the attorneys, and the parties know if he or she objects to the proposed settlement. The court has set a hearing for this purpose on July 1, 2014, at 10:00 a.m. at the following address:

Honorable Nanette K. Laughrey
United States District Judge
United States District Court for the Western District of Missouri
United States Courthouse
80 Lafayette Street
Jefferson City, Missouri 65101.

Class members may also object to the settlement by sending a letter marked "Lane v. Lombardi Settlement" before June 26, 2014, to the court at the address listed above. Class members may also call the American Civil Liberties Union of Missouri Foundation, which represents the class in this lawsuit, with any questions, at: (314) 652-3114.

Pay Tel Receives Waiver of Prison Phone Rate Caps

ON JANUARY 8, 2014, PAY TEL COMMUNICATIONS, a North Carolina company that provides phone services at correctional facilities in 13 states, filed a petition requesting a waiver of the rate caps on interstate (long distance) prison phone calls imposed by the Federal Communications Commission. The rate caps went into effect on February 11, 2014. [See: PLN, Feb. 2014, p.10].

As a result of longstanding efforts by prisoners, their family members and advocacy organizations (including the Campaign for Prison Phone Justice) against exorbitant prison and jail phone rates, the FCC ordered the rate caps and other reforms after examining the issue for almost a decade in a proceeding known as the Wright petition. The rate caps include a maximum of $.25 per minute for collect interstate calls and $.21 per minute for debit or prepaid interstate calls. [See: PLN, Dec. 2013, p.1].

The FCC's Wireline Competition Bureau found that Pay Tel had "met its burden of proof to establish a good cause to grant a limited, temporary waiver of the Commission's interim [prison phone] rate cap rule." Accordingly, on February 11, 2014, Pay Tel received a nine-month "narrow waiver" that allows the company to charge phone rates above the caps, not to exceed $.46 per minute for interstate prison phone calls – or up to $6.90 for a 15-minute call. Absent any further action by the FCC, the waiver will expire on November 11, 2014. See: In the Matter of Rates for Interstate Inmate Calling Services, FCC WC Docket No. 12-375.

Pay Tel had argued it could not recover its costs if it was required to comply with the FCC's rate caps, due to intrastate (in-state) rate restrictions in five of the states where it provides phone services. The Human Rights Defense Center – the parent organization of Prison Legal News – had filed comments with the FCC contesting the claims made by Pay Tel in its waiver petition.

Separately, other prison phone service providers such as Global Tel*Link (GTL) and Securus have challenged the FCC's rate caps and other reforms in the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals, and Securus has applied for a blanket rate cap waiver in all of the states where Pay Tel has contracts. But unlike Pay Tel, Securus did not submit detailed documentation indicating how the rate caps would inhibit the company's ability to recover its costs. Pay Tel had submitted records to the FCC and Wireline Competition Bureau showing that its costs exceeded the rate caps, which was instrumental in obtaining the waiver.

The petitioners in the Wright petition have opposed Securus' request for a "me too" rate cap waiver, noting that "Securus has steadfastly refused to provide any actual cost data to the FCC." By continuing to pay commission kickbacks to correctional agencies for intrastate calls while failing to provide the FCC or Wireline Competition Bureau with financial statements that demonstrate the company's actual costs, it will be more difficult for Securus to justify its waiver request.

The Wright petitioners argued in a March 11, 2014 comment in opposition to Securus' request that "until such time that Securus and the other [prison phone service] providers are willing to submit the same financial information as provided by Pay Tel Communications in connection with its Petition for Waiver, i.e., audited Financial Statements, substantive cost studies, the FCC must deny any attempt to extend similar relief."

Meanwhile, both GTL and Securus have stated that due to the rate caps imposed by the FCC, they are no longer paying commission kickbacks to correctional agencies on revenue generated from interstate prison phone calls. ■

Oregon Judge Scolded for Courtroom Rant

by Mark Wilson

THE OREGON SUPREME COURT HAS publicly censured a trial court judge for a profanity-laced tirade during a sentencing hearing.

In October 2011, Richard Lee Taylor, 60, was convicted of 21 sex offenses involving two 12-year-old boys. Evidence of his crimes included video recordings that showed Taylor sexually abusing the victims. The recordings were so disturbing that jurors thanked Jackson County Circuit Court Judge Tim P. Barnack when he stopped some of the videos from being shown during the trial. Several jurors wept and three asked if they could receive counseling.

Since Taylor had a prior California sex abuse conviction, prosecutors requested that he receive a life sentence.

Judge Barnack gave Taylor the opportunity to speak during his January 21, 2012 sentencing hearing, but Taylor said he had "nothing to say."

That apparently was the last straw for the judge. "I don't think you have a soul," Barnack stated. He called Taylor a "piece of shit" and said community members wondered why he wasn't "hanging from a tree." The judge repeatedly asked Taylor if he wanted to salvage his soul, and said he personally hoped that Taylor rots in prison.

"We are going to make sure you never get out," Judge Barnack remarked as he sentenced Taylor to 21 life sentences without the possibility of parole. "I've seen the cells for people like you. They're skinny, they're small, and I think you get an hour of daylight. You will rot, and for what you did to these people, that's where you should be."

Judge Barnack sent an email to other Jackson County Circuit Court judges after the sentencing hearing, apologizing for his remarks. He said that he, too, was traumatized by the evidence in the case, and that he lost control of his emotions when Taylor declined to speak because he felt Taylor's silence "evidenced an indifferent and unsympathetic attitude towards his victims, one of whom was in the courtroom."

Barnack acknowledged that his comments were inappropriate and he sought counseling from more experienced judges regarding the best way to manage emotionally-charged courtroom situations. As a result he adopted new procedures, including the use of a prepared script during sentencing to ensure that his outburst would not be repeated.

"I've learned from this experience and I look forward to continuing to serve the people of Jackson County," he said.

The Oregon Supreme Court noted that Judge Barnack and the Commission on Judicial Fitness and Disability stipulated that he had violated two rules of the Oregon Code of Judicial Conduct, and Barnack agreed to a public censure. The Supreme Court approved the censure, which does not impact his duties as a judge or include any fines or fees. See: In re Barnack, 353 Ore. 205, 299 P.3d 525 (Or. 2013).

Judge Barnack is currently running for re-election in 2014. ■

Research Finds that Conjugal Visits Correlate with Fewer Sexual Assaults

A STUDY CONDUCTED BY RESEARCHERS at Florida International University (FIU) found that state prison systems that permit conjugal visits report fewer rapes and sexual assaults than those where such visits are prohibited – a finding that the researchers said tends to dispute the theory that sex offenses are crimes of power rather than a means of sexual gratification.

“Our findings propel the idea that sexual violence can be attenuated given appropriate policy initiatives,” stated the authors of the 2012 study, Stewart D’Alessio, Jamie Flexon and Lisa Stolzenberg. In spite of the report’s findings, two states recently announced that they are discontinuing their conjugal visitation programs.

The FIU study was conducted over a three-year period, from 2004–2006, in the five states that provided conjugal visits at that time: California, Mississippi, New Mexico, New York and Washington. [See: PLN, May 2013, p.1].

“Inmate-on-inmate sexual offending is much less pronounced in states that allow conjugal visitation,” the study concluded.

While sexual violence occurred in state prison systems that prohibit conjugal visits at an average rate of 226 incidents per 100,000 prisoners, it occurred almost four times less frequently in the five states that permitted such visits – 57 per 100,000 prisoners.

The FIU researchers said the effect of conjugal visitation in reducing sexual assaults among prisoners should encourage more states to consider allowing such visits, which the study noted have other positive effects. For example, conjugal visits, also known as family visits, help “improve the functioning of a marriage by maintaining an inmate’s role as husband or wife, improve the inmate’s behavior while incarcerated, counter the effects of prisonization, and improve post-release success by enhancing the inmate’s ability to maintain ties with his or her family.”

“Additionally,” the study continued, “because conjugal visitation is reported to reduce homosexual activity and because AIDS is often spread by homosexual activity, conjugal visitation may help to attenuate the spread of AIDS in prison.”

The researchers acknowledged their study had certain limitations, particularly that rape and sexual assault among prisoners are underreported and, as a result, there could have been more incidents of sexual victimization in states that allow conjugal visits than reflected in their data.

Nevertheless, the authors of the study maintained that their findings have “other policy implications.” Treatment programs, they argued, “should be geared to view sexual offending as a sex crime instead of solely as a crime of power.” Such programs, the study said, could reduce recidivism among sex offenders.

On February 1, 2014, Mississippi joined the 45 states that prohibit conjugal visits, halting the century-old practice due to what officials called budget issues and concerns about babies being born as a possible result of the visits.

“There are costs associated with the staff’s time, having to escort inmates to and from the visitation facility, supervising personal hygiene and keeping up with the infrastructure of the facility,” Mississippi DOC Commissioner Christopher B. Epps said in a press release. “Then, even though we provide contraception, we have no idea how many women are getting pregnant only for the child to be raised by one parent.”

Of the more than 22,000 prisoners in Mississippi state prisons, just 155 were allowed conjugal visits in fiscal year 2013. Under the program, the visits were available only to prisoners classified as minimum- or medium-security who did not have a written rules violation within the previous six months.

“While both the extended family visitation and conjugal visit program involve a small percentage of inmates, the cost coupled with big-ticket items adds up,” Epps stated. “The benefits of the programs don’t outweigh the cost in the overall budget.”

Family members who participated in the visits strongly disagreed.

Tina Perry, 49, who had been visiting her incarcerated husband every few months for the past eight years, said prisoners’ spouses should not be forced to suffer any more than they already do, and the state should not deprive them of something that is an infrequent but important part of their relationship.

Some spouses argued it’s not about the sex but rather about privacy. “The little 60 minutes isn’t a lot of time, but I appreciate it because we can just talk and hold each other and be with each other,” said Ebony Fisher, 25, who would drive nearly three hours to see her husband, who is serving a 60-year sentence. But Fisher also admitted that the end of conjugal visits means no more children for the couple.

“Let me have that option,” she said. “I feel like they are taking away my choice.”

“You never just get husband and wife time” during regular prison visits, noted Amy Parsons, who drove eight hours for a one-hour conjugal visit with her husband, who is not due to be released until 2022.

“It’s not romantic, but it doesn’t matter,” she said. “I just want people to realize it’s about the alone time with your husband. I understand they are in there for a reason. Obviously they did something wrong. But they are human, too. So are we.”

Even prison officials conceded that the visits were a deterrent to unruly behavior among prisoners. “Conjugal visits have been a privilege,” noted Mississippi DOC spokeswoman Tara Booth. “So in that sense, it has, as other internal opportunities, helped to maintain order.”

On April 16, 2014, New Mexico prison officials announced the end of conjugal visits effective the following month, citing concerns about contraband and sexually transmitted diseases. They estimated annual savings of around $120,000 by discontinuing the visitation program, which had been in effect for 30 years.

“Some of these policies are old and tired,” said Corrections Secretary Gregg Marcantel. “They aren’t producing the outcomes we need to help our inmates and make our communities safer.”

Conjugal visitation was implemented in New Mexico following an infamous 1980 riot at the state penitentiary near Santa Fe that resulted in 33 deaths; the visits were intended to help reduce tension in the prison population.

“After two years of research we found the overnight stays had no impact on decreasing the rate of inmates returning to jail,” said New Mexico DOC spokeswoman Alex Tomlin, who noted that only around 150 prisoners qualified for conjugal visits. The visits will be replaced with family programs that include classes on parenting and financial planning.

When discontinuing their conjugal visitation programs, neither Mississippi nor New Mexico officials addressed the findings of the FIU study relative to the effect conjugal visits have on reducing sexual assaults among prisoners. ■

Cancellation of BOP Elderly Offender Pilot Program Moots Appeal

by Michael Brodheim

ON JULY 11, 2013, IN AN AMENDED ruling, the Ninth Circuit dismissed as moot the appeal of a federal prisoner who had been denied entry into a pilot program that allowed the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) to release certain elderly offenders from BOP facilities and place them on home detention, because the program had been discontinued.

The Second Chance Act of 2007 created a pilot program which allowed the BOP, in its discretion, to place certain nonviolent elderly offenders on home detention after they had served the greater of 10 years or 75% of their term of incarceration. [See: PLN, Feb. 2009, p.8].

BOP prisoner Perry A. McCullough applied to the elderly offender pilot program in 2009. McCullough, who had been sentenced in 1990 to 380 months in federal prison for drug trafficking, calculated that he would be eligible for the program in March 2010 if the BOP took into account his good time credits.

The BOP declined to consider McCullough's good time credits, however, and found he would not be eligible for the pilot program until March 2013, once he had served 75% of his sentence. After exhausting his administrative remedies, McCullough filed a pro se petition for habeas relief in federal court in Arizona. The district court denied his petition because, under a plain language analysis of the applicable statute, the BOP was not required to consider good time credits when evaluating whether a prisoner was eligible for the program.

Meanwhile, in September 2010, the elderly offender pilot program authorized under the Second Chance Act was discontinued.

The Ninth Circuit held that the cancellation of the program divested it of jurisdiction, and dismissed McCullough's appeal as moot since the relief requested in his petition was "no longer available because of the termination of the pilot program." The Court of Appeals found no applicable exceptions to the mootness doctrine in this case; hence, the district court's dismissal of the habeas petition was affirmed. See: McCullough v. Graber, 726 F.3d 1057 (9th Cir. 2013). ■

Wisconsin DOC Equips Guards with Pepper Spray, Tasers

A REPORT COMPILED BY THE WISCONSIN Department of Corrections (DOC) found there were 351 assaults, attempted assaults and assault-related injuries involving prison staff from mid-2012 to mid-2013.

In response, Corrections Secretary Ed Wall announced in December 2013 that he was equipping guards with 3-ounce canisters of pepper spray to help prevent and stop violent incidents.

Wall noted that the threat of pepper spray alone can defuse dangerous situations and deter assaults. He said he is also considering furnishing civilian prison employees, such as nurses and teachers, with pepper spray.

Guards at the Milwaukee Secure Detention Facility and the Green Bay Correctional Institution were given pepper spray in a 2013 pilot program. The program, considered to be a success, is expanding statewide.

"The pepper spray is now being rolled out to officers at all minimum- and medium-security institutions," said Wall and DOC Deputy Secretary Deidre Morgan.

State prisons previously had been equipped with Tasers, but they were kept locked up until needed. Now, supervisors in contact with prisoners are allowed to carry Tasers.

"It should have been done a long time ago. You stop stuff before anything happens," stated Sgt. Daniel Meehan at the Waupun Correctional Institution.

Meehan, the local president of the Wisconsin Association for Correctional Law Enforcement, said he welcomed the DOC's plan to equip guards with pepper spray. Not everyone was supportive of the idea, though.

"That's a two-edged sword," observed Marty Beil, executive director of the Wisconsin State Employees Union. "That pepper spray can be taken off an officer as quickly as it can be used by an officer."

Beil credited the DOC with improving its tracking of prisoner-on-staff assaults; for years, such data had been poorly maintained. But the best way to protect employees from being assaulted, he said, would be for DOC administrators to work closely with prison staff.

That was the case before Governor Scott Walker eliminated collective bargaining for most public employees in 2011, Beil noted. He called the deployment of pepper spray and Tasers "window dressing."

The DOC report found there were 252 assaults on staff, 40 attempted assaults and 59 assault-related injuries from July 2012 to June 2013. Those incidents included attempted assaults that consisted of prisoners unsuccessfully trying to spit on guards, as well as injuries that guards sustained from other staff members when trying to break up fights.

Further, to place the data in context, the 351 assaults, attempted assaults and injuries during the one-year period covered in the DOC report occurred in a prison system with around 21,800 offenders.

According to the report, prisoners with serious mental health problems accounted for 47% of the assaults; 59% of assaults and 70% of attempted assaults occurred at maximum-security prisons; and approximately 70% of assaults and attempted assaults happened in segregation units.

In addition to equipping guards with pepper spray and Tasers, the DOC has installed boxes on the doors of segregation cells, similar to devices used at bank drive-through windows. Food trays are placed in the box, then the door to the box is closed before it can be opened on the other side. Thus, prisoners are less likely to throw items at staff during meal times. ■

California Prison Regulation Governing Gang Validation Upheld by Ninth Circuit

by Michael Brodheim

LAST YEAR THE NINTH CIRCUIT UPHELD the constitutionality of a California prison regulation that guides state prison officials in determining whether or not a prisoner should be classified as gang-affiliated.

In California, a prisoner affiliated with a gang – whether as a "member" or "associate" – is deemed to pose a threat to institutional safety and security sufficient to warrant placement in administrative segregation. Pursuant to Cal. Code Regs., title 15 § 3378(c)(4), an "associate" is defined to be a person "who is involved periodically or regularly with members or associates of a gang." Prison officials must show such involvement through three independent sources of documentation indicating association with validated gang members or associates.

In April 1997, California state prisoner Carlos Castro was validated as an associate of the Mexican Mafia, a recognized prison gang. He was then transferred to the Security Housing Unit at Pelican Bay State Prison.

Castro filed suit in federal court in 1998, challenging his validation on due process grounds. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants, which was reversed by the Ninth Circuit in a 2002 ruling that held due process requires prisoners to be afforded a meaningful opportunity to present their views to the critical decision maker in administrative segregation cases. [See: PLN, July 2003, p.17].

Following remand and a bench trial, which "found that Castro did not receive due process in his initial validation procedure," the district court issued an order requiring prison officials to determine whether or not Castro was currently a gang associate. As a result of that order they conducted a second validation inquiry, and again concluded that Castro was a gang associate in April 2011.

On appeal, Castro argued that the definition of "associate" in § 3378(c)(4) is facially unconstitutionally vague, and therefore the procedure used to validate him as a gang associate did not comport with due process.

Finding no case raising a similar challenge, the Court of Appeals began its examination of Castro's claims by assuming that the void-for-vagueness doctrine could be applied to prison regulations. Applying the analysis employed in void-for-vagueness challenges to criminal statutes, the appellate court considered 1) whether § 3378(c)(4) defines "associate" with sufficient definiteness that "ordinary people can understand what conduct is prohibited" (e.g., what conduct can be used as evidence of being a gang associate), and 2) whether the regulation does so “in a manner that does not encourage arbitrary and discriminatory enforcement.”

The Ninth Circuit concluded that the regulation was not unconstitutionally vague and gave Castro clear notice of the types of evidence that prison officials could (and did) rely on to validate him as a gang associate. It concluded, moreover, that there was “some evidence” – the standard that should have been used by the district court – which showed, at a minimum, that Castro associated with the Mexican Mafia on more than one occasion. For example, he had signed a birthday card sent to a validated gang associate and was implicated in a plot to stab another prisoner. The dismissal of Castro’s suit was therefore affirmed. See: Castro v. Terhune, 712 F.3d 1304 (9th Cir. 2013). ■

Oregon PPS Sanctions May Not Exceed 180 Days; Prior Contrary Ruling Overturned

by Mark Wilson

THE OREGON COURT OF APPEALS HAS held that the Parole Board lacks authority to impose incarceration sanctions in excess of 180 days for post-prison supervision (PPS) violations for life-sentenced offenders convicted of murder.

Richard Hostetter was convicted of murder in 1992 and released on PPS in 2006. He then committed a technical violation by using alcohol and failing to report to his parole officer.

On February 11, 2008, the Oregon Board of Parole and Post-Prison Supervision (Board) revoked Hostetter’s PPS and imposed a sanction of 84 months incarceration, establishing a projected release date of January 17, 2015.

Under former OAR 253-11-004(3) (9/1/89), the Board was authorized to impose incarceration sanctions of “up to ninety (90) days for a technical violation and up to one hundred and eighty (180) days for conduct constituting a crime.” The rule also imposed a 180-day cap on total incarceration sanctions during an entire PPS term, “except as provided in OAR 253-05-004(2)” for offenders like Hostetter serving a life sentence for murder.

“Thus, OAR 253-11-004(3) both limits re-incarceration of an offender for any single PPS violation to 90 or 180 days and places a 180-day cap on aggregate incarcerative sanctions for multiple PPS violations,” subject to the exception in OAR 253-05-004(2). In Jones v. Board of Parole, 231 Ore. App. 256, 218 P.3d 904 (Or. Ct. App. 2009), the Oregon Court of Appeals held “that the 90- and 180-day limitations in OAR 253-11-004(3) do not apply to offenders on lifetime PPS for a murder conviction.” The Jones court read the exception as applying to both the aggregate cap and individual sanction caps for PPS violations.

Hostetter appealed his 84-month incarceration sanction, arguing that Jones incorrectly interpreted the applicable rules. Noting that “the proper construction of OAR 253-11-004(3) and OAR 253-05-004 was not ‘squarely’ presented ... in Jones,” Hostetter argued that Jones should be overturned.

The Court of Appeals agreed. Applying rules of statutory construction, the Court concurred with Hostetter “that the Criminal Justice Council and legislature intended that the exception for those on lifetime PPS for murder set forth in OAR 253-05-004 apply only to OAR 253-11-004(3)’s 180-day aggregate limitation.” Such offenders may not receive more than 90- or 180-days sanctions for each individual PPS violation. As such, the Board erred in imposing an 84-month incarceration sanction for Hostetter’s technical violation. See: Hostetter v. Board of Parole, 255 Ore. App. 328, 296 P.3d 664 (Or. Ct. App. 2013).

The Board appealed the decision to the Oregon Supreme Court, which denied review on June 20, 2013. ■

California: Trial Court Cannot Abdicate its Responsibility to Examine Peace Officer Personnel Records

by Michael Brodheim

ON MAY 6, 2013, THE CALIFORNIA Court of Appeal held that a trial court conducting an in camera review of peace officer personnel records must examine the records itself, and cannot abdicate that responsibility in favor of an assessment by the custodian of the records with respect to whether they contain discoverable information.

In November 2007, Costa Mesa police officers, along with state parole agents, traveled to Carlsbad in unmarked vehicles to arrest Ronald Jay Sisson, also known as Brian Lee Olson – a parolee and suspected gang member. In the incident that ensued, the officers fired 27 rounds into Sisson's vehicle after he rammed police cars and struck an officer when attempting to drive away. The gunfire killed Esther Elizabeth Evans, a passenger in Sisson's front seat, who was shot in the head.

Sisson was subsequently charged with one count of provocative act murder in connection with Evans' death plus three counts of assaulting a peace officer with a deadly weapon. He disputed the officers' version of events and filed two discovery motions under Pitchess v. Superior Court, 11 Cal.3d 531 (Cal. 1974), seeking complaints of dishonesty, false reporting and excessive force in the officers' and parole agents' personnel files. He alleged the officers and agents had lied and falsified their statements concerning the incident.

Instead of examining the files itself, the trial court placed the custodian of the records under oath and then asked general questions about the contents of the records that had been produced. Only when the custodian indicated that, in its assessment, a record included discoverable information did the trial court actually examine the record. Incredibly, the trial court deferred to the custodian's opinion that the records of an internal affairs review of the shooting incident at issue contained no discoverable information.

The Court of Appeal reversed, noting that under California Supreme Court precedent, "the locus of decision making is to be the trial court, not the prosecution or the custodian of records." Additionally, "while the trial court made an effort to inquire into what types of documents the custodians opted not to produce, the effort fell short of requiring the custodians to establish on the record what documents or category of documents were included in the officers' complete personnel files and, where applicable, to explain their decisions to withhold certain documents."

The appellate court concluded that Sisson had "showed good cause for discovery of complaints of dishonesty or false reporting as to some officers, but did not show good cause for discovery of complaints of excessive force as to any officers." Accordingly, his petition for review was granted in part and denied in part. See: Sisson v. Supreme Court, 216 Cal. App. 4th 24 (Cal. App. 4th Dist. 2013).

In September 2013, Sisson pleaded guilty to a reduced charge of manslaughter and two counts of assault on peace officers using a deadly weapon (his vehicle). He was sentenced to 13 years and 8 months in prison pursuant to a plea agreement. ■

Connecticut Town Raises Stink Over Sewage Discharged by State Prison

THE TOWN OF CHESHIRE, CONNECTICUT has decided that if it has to take more crap from the Connecticut Department of Correction (CDOC), then it wants help to pay for it.

Discussions are underway between town and state officials to resolve a lawsuit filed by Cheshire in July 2012 that seeks to renegotiate the terms of an agreement with the CDOC, to require the state to help upgrade the town's wastewater treatment plant due to the amount of sewage discharged from a nearby prison complex.

Officials have admitted, though, that the negotiations are not producing any positive results.

"We met with members of the Department of Corrections and Attorney General's office to see if we could negotiate a settlement, but right now it's in court just sitting there," Cheshire town manager Michael Milone said in April 2013.

"In the meantime, we are hoping to appeal to some of the state agencies to resolve this – we are hoping to sit down and negotiate a resolution," he added.

The current agreement allows for 350,000 gallons of effluent each day from the complex, which houses around 2,000 prisoners at the Cheshire Correctional Institution and the Manson Youth Institution. But town officials say that for years, the prison complex has discharged more sewage into the treatment plant than is permitted by either the town or the state.

"They have an agreement with the town that goes back to 1990 that says that they cannot exceed 350,000 gallons per day and they have consistently exceeded that for nine or 10 years," Milone said. The town is seeking to increase the permit requirements to 450,000 gallons of sewage per day.

Cheshire officials also want the CDOC to contribute 25% of a planned $31 million upgrade to the town's wastewater treatment plant; the upgrade, scheduled to begin in late 2012, was estimated to take more than two years to complete.

"[T]he prison represents 25% of the effluence treated there, so the state should pay 25% of the cost," Milone argued. He said the town's lawsuit was prompted by the state Senate's failure to pass legislation that would have required the CDOC to renegotiate its wastewater agreement.

"We've been trying to negotiate the host agreement since 2006, and we don't feel they [state officials] have been negotiating in good faith," said Milone. "We feel we've exhausted all of our options."

Cheshire's lawsuit against the CDOC remains pending. See: Town of Cheshire v. State of Connecticut DOC, Hartford Superior Court (CT), Case No. HHD-CV-12-6033159S. ■

Prison Education Programs Threatened

by Matt Clarke

CORRECTIONS OFFICIALS ACROSS THE country fear that two recent developments will drastically limit educational opportunities for prisoners – a scenario that research indicates could lead to higher recidivism rates.

First, Congress failed to renew federal funding in 2011, 2012 and 2013 for a grant program that helps finance higher education courses for prisoners. The grants, known as Specter funds – named after correctional education advocate and late-U.S. Senator Arlen Specter – provided money to state prison systems that helped underwrite a portion of the cost of post-secondary programs for prisoners.

The second development concerns significant changes in the GED program that allows people to earn the equivalent of a high school diploma. Starting on January 1, 2014, the test was realigned to match Common Core State Standards, and the old pencil-and-paper exams were eliminated in favor of a computer-based test. Most prisons and jails that offer GED classes will be affected by the change.

Prison Education Research

THE ELIMINATION OF SPECTER FUNDS compounds the woes of prison education programs that are already suffering from cuts imposed by states facing budget shortfalls. A study conducted by the non-profit RAND Corporation on behalf of the federal Bureau of Justice Assistance found that states reduced funding for prison education programs by an average of 6% between fiscal years 2009 and 2012. The study reported that states with large prison populations cut prison education funding by 10%, on average, while states with medium-sized populations slashed education budgets by an average of 20%.

The February 2014 RAND report, “How Effective is Correctional Education, and Where Do We Go from Here?,” found that academic courses were hardest hit by the state funding cuts.

“There has been a dramatic contraction of the prison education system, particularly those programs focused on academic instruction versus vocational training,” said Lois Davis, a RAND senior policy researcher and the study’s lead author. “There are now fewer teachers, fewer course offerings and fewer students enrolled in academic education programs,” she remarked in a statement released along with the report.

Further, the study found that on average, every dollar spent on prison education programs results in a savings of four to five dollars in the cost of re-incarcerating prisoners within the three years following their release, due to lower recidivism rates.

“We need to weigh the short-term need to reduce budgets with the long-term consequence of trimming programs that help keep people from returning to prison after they have paid their debt to society,” Davis said.

The RAND report integrated a 2013 meta-analysis of more than 30 years of previous research which concluded that “inmates who participated in correctional education programs had 43% lower odds of returning to prison than inmates who did not.” The positive impact of prison-based education programs on recidivism rates has long been known. [See: PLN, March 2012, p.10].

“These findings reinforce the need to become smarter on crime by expanding proven strategies for keeping our communities safe, and ensuring that those who have paid their debts to society have the chance to become productive citizens,” U.S. Attorney General Eric Holder said when the meta-analysis findings were released in August 2013.

“Correctional education programs provide incarcerated individuals with the skills and knowledge essential to their futures,” added U.S. Secretary of Education Arne Duncan. “Investing in these education programs helps released prisoners get back on their feet – and stay on their feet – when they return to communities across the country.”

Further, the RAND report determined the odds of an offender finding employment after release from prison was 13% higher for those who participated in academic or vocational programs compared to those who did not. Prisoners who received vocational training were 28% more likely to obtain post-release employment.

Despite the numerous studies that have linked increased educational opportunities to lower recidivism rates, state officials are skeptical about future federal funding for post-secondary prison education programs – which was largely gutted after such programs were barred from receiving federal Pell grants under President Clinton in 1994. [See: PLN, Jan. 1998, p.4; Dec. 1994, p.7]. As a result of the loss of Pell grants, college programs for prisoners dropped from approximately 350 nationwide to around a dozen, according to The New York Times.

Loss of Specter Funds

THE DISCONTINUATION OF FEDERAL Specter funds starting in 2011 has prison education officials nationwide scrambling to find alternative funding sources.

“I’m not a pessimistic person, but I don’t see this one coming back any time soon,” said Stephen Steuerer, executive director of the National Correctional Education Association (NCEA), in reference to the end of Specter funds. “We’re cutting our own throats,” he added.

Specter funds had been provided through the Grants to States for Workplace and Community Transition Training for Incarcerated Individuals, 20 U.S.C. § 1151.

For example, Minnesota’s prison system received around $150,000 per year in Specter funds; the money was used to partner with state colleges and universities, which provided teachers and class materials. When the funding was cut in 2011, the partnership did not dissolve because the state prison system had a surplus from previous years, but that was only temporary. Minnesota prison officials have admitted they don't know where they will secure new funding, but vowed to continue looking.

"It's an important program, and we're going to do what we can to try and keep it continuing," insisted George Kimball, the prison system's director for adult education.

Other state corrections officials have found themselves in a similar position; about a third of the nation's prisons offer post-secondary education programs of some type.

West Virginia will be cutting classes by half or worse, according to Fran Waring, superintendent of the state's Office of Institutional Education Programs.

"There's no money," complained Waring. "They did away with Pell grants, and now they've done away with this."

In Florida, Specter funds were used to support a number of prison vocational programs, including web design courses at the Lawtey Correctional Institution and Hernando Correctional Institution; a culinary arts program at the Madison Correctional Institution; and a landscape irrigation course at the Suwannee Correctional Institution.

NCEA President Don Kiffin, who is in charge of education at a prison in Oklahoma, said his institution was down to its last semester of funding after losing $7,000 to $10,000 in annual Specter funds.

"A lot of people coming to me that want to go to school [are] wondering why I can't give them money to go," Kiffin stated. "I have to pick, choose and refuse."

"You can basically kiss the post-secondary programs goodbye," remarked NCEA director Steurer, referring to the Maryland prison system where he worked before retiring.

Steurer said short-sighted politicians don't look at the long-term benefits of prisoner education, such as lower prison populations due to reduced recidivism or having more former prisoners become productive, tax-paying citizens.

Legislation introduced in the U.S. House of Representatives, H.R. 803, known as the SKILLS Act, repeals the statute that authorizes Specter funds and replaces it with a different federal funding initiative for prison education programs. H.R. 803 passed in the House in March 2013; a companion bill in the Senate, S.B. 1911, was introduced in January 2014 and has been referred to a committee.

Changes in GED Testing

MEANWHILE, THE RAND STUDY PREDICTED that recent changes to GED testing will pose another threat to prison education programs. The report warned that the realignment of the test to Common Core State Standards and the switch to a computer-based exam could have a negative impact on prisoners trying to earn their GEDs.

"These two changes have important implications for correctional administrators and educators in terms of preparing for and implementing the new test," RAND stated. "Educators will need to be prepared to teach the [new standards] and prepare students for a more rigorous GED test that will require students to demonstrate high-level thinking skills and exhibit deeper levels of knowledge in four subject areas."

The report said the switch to a computer-based test will make the exam even more difficult for prisoners in programs that generally have limited technology resources. It "will require educators to prepare students to have a level of computer literacy and skills necessary to successfully navigate the test,” which in turn has “implications when it comes to agency budgets and professional development needs of educators and present[s] a number of logistical concerns when it comes to preparing to implement computer-based testing.”

According to RAND, 31 states plan to use the new, more difficult GED exams. A survey of correctional education directors in those states found that 52% believe the new tests will have a negative impact on the number of prisoners who earn GEDs. Further, 68% indicated that as a result, they anticipate a decline in the number of prisoners participating in GED programs.

The RAND report also found that 42% of state prison education officials believe it will take more time for prisoners to prepare for the redesigned tests, and 45% said they expect fewer prisoners will be adequately prepared.

Facilities that do not currently have computers to provide the new tests can request a waiver to continue using paper exams on a temporary basis. According to the GED Testing Service, “Prisons not able to offer computer-based testing will continue to offer the 2002 Series GED Test on paper for a limited approved amount of time.”

Over 75% of the states responding to the RAND survey reported that the increased cost of implementing computer-based GED testing was a concern. The new GED exams will cost around $120 each, which, according to USA Today, is a significant increase from the $70 average cost for paper tests. In some jurisdictions the increase may be passed along to students in whole or part, though GED testing costs are sometimes subsidized by public agencies.

As noted in the RAND report, the new GED exam comes on the heels of a growing trend by states to slash funding for prisoner education. In Oregon, for example, Department of Corrections spokesman Betty Bernt said the state cut roughly $100,000 from the department’s Adult Basic Skills Development program in the four years between 2009 and 2013. The budget cuts led to a nearly 13% drop in the number of prisoners participating in the program.

Due to the cost increase of the new GED exam, some correctional facilities are switching to an alternative, less expensive high school equivalency test known as HiSET.

A Case Study: Prison Education in New York

IN NEW YORK, A SENIOR OFFICIAL WITH the administration of Governor Andrew Cuomo told reporters at a March 31, 2014 briefing that non-profit organizations and foundations had expressed interest in financing the governor’s plan to expand college classes at 10 state prisons.

The announcement signaled the revival of a program that Cuomo unveiled in February 2014, which was quickly scuttled after New York state lawmakers voiced fierce opposition to using taxpayer dollars to fund college courses for prisoners.

Cuomo first detailed the proposal in a speech to the New York State Black, Puerto Rican, Hispanic and Asian Legislative Caucus. The governor said New York spends about $60,000 per prisoner – what he called “more money than it takes to send a person to Harvard for a year” – and that paying for one year of college education for the same prisoner would cost about $5,000.

“We’re imprisoning, we’re isolating, but we’re not rehabilitating the way we should,” Governor Cuomo said at the time.

The plan drew immediate praise from the Caucus. “A higher level of education will support these men and women in moving forward with their lives, as opposed to returning to criminal activity and prison,” stated Caucus chairman and state Assemblyman Karim Camara.

The deal-breaker for lawmakers, however, was the plan to use taxpayer money to fund the initiative. Republican state Assemblyman Joe Borelli said the issue was not the proposal itself but rather that the plan favored one group of people – prisoners – over another.

“The problem with the program is not the idea of rehabilitation for convicted felons,” said Borelli. “The problem is the fundamental inequity of the proposal.... How can we provide a free education for people who have made the wrong choices in life, while we let the people who made good choices struggle?”

Borelli noted that college students in New York typically incur an average of $25,537 in student loans.

Governor Cuomo had touted the plan as a way to reduce future prison spending. State data shows that New York’s recidivism rate is approximately 40%. By comparison, since 1999 the rate of re-incarceration dropped to only 4% for prisoners who participated in an existing post-secondary education program sponsored by Bard College at six medium- and maximum-security New York state prisons. As of 2013, more than 250 prisoners have obtained degrees through the Bard Prison Initiative.

“I understand the sentiment” against using public funds to pay for colleges classes for prisoners, the governor conceded at a news conference to mark the passage of the new state budget. “I don’t agree with it, but I understand it, and I understand the appearance of it.”

Currently, higher education programs are offered at 22 New York state prisons; most are funded with private money. For example, the Prison-to-College Pipeline, a project of the John Jay College of Criminal Justice, began offering classes at the Otisville Correctional Facility in 2011. Other college programs are provided through Bard and Cornell University.

Governor Cuomo’s proposed initiative would have expanded existing programs so more prisoners could participate in college courses and earn associate’s and bachelor’s degrees. ■

States Adopt Sentencing Changes Following Supreme Court Ruling on Juvenile Lifers

AWAVE OF LEGAL MANEUVERING IS sweeping across the nation due to a deeply divided U.S. Supreme Court decision regarding juveniles serving mandatory sentences of life without parole, and a number of states have taken action as a result of the ruling.

The high court held in June 2012 that mandatory life-without-parole sentences for juveniles convicted of murder violate the Eighth Amendment's ban on cruel and unusual punishment. The 5-4 decision in Miller v. Alabama, 132 S.Ct. 2455 (2012) overturned life sentences imposed on two defendants who were 14 years old at the time they were convicted of murder.

The Supreme Court found that juvenile defendants can not be treated the same as adults for sentencing purposes because they are cognitively different, citing their “immaturity, impetuosity, and failure to appreciate risks and consequences.” The ruling was expected to affect around 2,000 prisoners nationwide.

Just weeks after the Miller decision, Iowa Governor Terry Branstad announced that he would commute life-without-parole sentences for 38 Iowa juvenile lifers, only to make them ineligible for parole until they have served at least 60 years in prison.

“Justice,” Branstad said, “is a balance, and these commutations ensure that justice is balanced with punishment for those vicious crimes and taking into account public safety.”

However, an Iowa district court overturned the governor's commutation in the first legal challenge filed by one of the affected prisoners. After hearing testimony in the case of Jeffrey K. Ragland, 44, who was 17 years old when sentenced to life without parole, the court held that Governor Branstad had exceeded his authority because his commutation did not allow for the individualized sentencing required by Miller, thus depriving Ragland of a meaningful opportunity to demonstrate his maturity and potential for rehabilitation.

The district court then re-sentenced Ragland to life with the possibility of parole after 25 years, making him immediately eligible for parole. The court also affirmed that a sentence of life without parole was cruel and unusual punishment as applied to Ragland, and criticized Branstad's commutation as being outside the intent of state law, which makes juveniles convicted of Class A felonies eligible for parole after 25 years.

The state challenged the re-sentencing order, but the Iowa Supreme Court affirmed the district court in August 2013 and pulled no punches in condemning Governor Branstad's actions.

“The sentence served by Ragland, as commuted, still amounts to cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment to the United States Constitution and Article I, Section 17 of the Iowa Constitution,” the state Supreme Court held. “Consequently, the district court properly resentenced Ragland.”

Supreme Court Justice David Wiggins took further aim at Branstad: “In this situation, is the Governor commuting a void sentence or sentencing the defendant for the first time in violation of the separation of powers doctrine?” he asked in a concurring opinion.

“Another observation is that the Governor’s imposition of a sentence might constitute a denial of due process – such as the right to present evidence at the sentence stage ... or the right to be informed of accusations, the right to a jury trial, the right to compulsory process, and the right to counsel under ... the Iowa Constitution,” Wiggins continued. See: State v. Ragland, 836 N.W.2d 107 (Iowa 2013).

In a separate ruling, the Iowa Supreme Court held that a 75-year sentence imposed on a juvenile defendant convicted of murder was subject to the limitations of Miller, even though it was not a sentence of life without parole.

“We conclude that Miller’s principles are fully applicable to a lengthy term-of-years sentence as was imposed in this case because an offender sentenced to a lengthy term-of-years sentence should not be worse off than an offender sentenced to life in prison without parole who has the benefit of an individualized hearing under Miller,” the Court wrote. See: State v. Null, 836 N.W.2d 41 (Iowa 2013).

Further, in a third case, the state Supreme Court found that Miller should be applied to a juvenile defendant sentenced to a mandatory fixed-term sentence in a non-homicide case. See: State v. Pearson, 836 N.W.2d 88 (Iowa 2013).

In Miller, the Supreme Court held that all pertinent factors, including age, education, life experiences and home environment, must be considered when judges impose sentences on defendants convicted of committing murder as juveniles.

Stephen Bright, director of the Southern Center for Human Rights and an instructor at Yale Law School, said at the very least, Branstad's decision to issue commutations mandating 60-year sentences was poor public policy.

“The main point of the Miller decision – and the main concern of any sentencing – should be individualized sentencing based on factors about each human being,” Bright said. “Obviously, nothing about any of the 38 individuals [Iowa prisoners convicted of murder as juveniles] was taken into account, just as it was not when they were sentenced to life imprisonment without parole.”

One of the Iowa lifers to have their sentences commuted, David Epps, was convicted of a burglary-murder when he was 16. Due to Branstad's commutation imposing a 60-year sentence, Epps, now 48, would not be eligible for parole until his mid-70s.

"I was thinking he was going to get some kind of release because he served 32 years on a life sentence," said David's brother, Dennis Epps. "[Branstad] might as well have left them serving a life sentence, because that's pretty much what that is."

Meanwhile, the ACLU announced its opposition to three bills introduced in the Iowa legislature in support of the governor's commutations. All three would allow judges to sentence juveniles convicted of first-degree murder to life without parole, or – at the judge’s discretion – to a mandatory minimum sentence that critics argue would not provide such offenders with a meaningful second chance.

The mandatory minimum sentence varies with the proposed legislation; a Senate bill (SSB 1089) would require a 45-year minimum, while in the House, one measure (HSB 105) proposes 50 years and a second (HSB 33) proposes 60 years. Juveniles convicted of murder in Iowa can still be sentenced to life without parole based on an individual determination by the trial court.

Juvenile lifers are facing similar situations in several other states, according to Drexel University law professor Dan Filler, who said the Miller ruling did not make clear whether it is to be applied retroactively to prisoners convicted as juveniles who are already serving life-without-parole sentences.

“When you look at the decision closely, it implicitly leaves room for exactly what the governor of Iowa did,” said Filler. “It doesn’t give us any guidance. You have to see this decision as entirely cloudy. Different states are going to do different things.”

Around half the states currently allow life-without-parole sentences for juveniles.

In Florida, the courts have done effectively the same thing as Governor Branstad in response to Miller. In some cases, Florida judges have re-sentenced juvenile lifers to 70- to 90-year prison terms. Michigan has adopted a similar response, with courts imposing sentences of 25 to 60 years rather than mandatory sentences of life without parole – although prosecutors can still request life sentences.

In Alabama, where the Miller case originated, state officials remain defiant.

“It is the [Alabama] Attorney General’s position that this rule does not apply retroactively,” said John C. Neiman Jr., the state’s solicitor general. “Ultimately, whether it will apply retroactively is going to be a question that will be litigated in, and decided by, the courts.”

Some states, however, have taken action in the spirit of the Supreme Court’s decision in Miller, and five have abolished life-without-parole sentences for all juvenile offenders.

In North Carolina, juvenile lifers are now eligible for parole review after serving 25 years following a statutory amendment that also requires judges to consider factors such as their age, immaturity, intellectual capacity, mental health history and the influence of familial or peer pressure when imposing sentences.

Texas’ highest court for criminal cases, the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals, held on March 12, 2014 that Miller applied retroactively to juveniles convicted of murder and sentenced to mandatory life without parole. The Court noted that judges must consider “how children are different, and how those differences counsel against irrevocably sentencing them to a lifetime in prison.” See: Ex parte Maxwell, 2014 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 264 (Tex. Crim. App. 2014).

Similarly, the Illinois Supreme Court held in March 2014 that Miller is to be applied retroactively – a decision that will affect around 100 Illinois prisoners currently serving life without parole. See: People v. Davis, 2014 IL 115595 (Ill. 2014).

On March 28, 2014, West Virginia Governor Earl Ray Tomblin signed a bill that ensures juveniles sentenced as adults will be eligible for parole after 15 years, including those serving life sentences. The legislation also requires courts to consider more than a dozen factors when sentencing juveniles convicted of serious crimes, including their age, family background and likelihood of rehabilitation.

Washington state recently abolished life-without-parole sentences for juvenile offenders under age 16, and made such sentences discretionary for 16- and 17-year-olds. The change will be applied retroactively to prisoners serving life without parole and life-equivalent sentences who were convicted as juveniles.

In Pennsylvania, however, the state Supreme Court has held that Miller does not apply retroactively – a ruling that affects about 450 prisoners serving mandatory life sentences for crimes committed as juveniles. Pennsylvania has more juvenile lifers than any other state. See: Commonwealth v. Cunningham, 81 A.3d 1 (Pa. 2013). ■

Reports on Elderly Prisoners Spur Call for Reforms

AN INCREASING NUMBER OF ADVOCACY groups are calling for reforms in the wake of three reports that found the nation's aging prison population is reaching record levels at growing expense to taxpayers, mostly due to the high cost of medical care for geriatric prisoners.

The studies noted that the vast majority of elderly prisoners pose a low risk of reoffending but were caught in the peak years of "get tough on crime" sentencing during the 1980s and '90s. As a result, more prisoners are growing older in prison. [See: PLN, Dec. 2010, p.1].

An October 2013 report by The Pew Charitable Trusts identified the aging prison population as the primary factor behind a median 52% jump in prisoner healthcare spending in 42 states between 2001 and 2008.

"Health care is consuming a growing share of state budgets, and corrections departments are not immune to this trend," said Maria Schiff, who heads the State Health Care Spending Project, an initiative of The Pew Charitable Trusts and the John D. and Catherine T. MacArthur Foundation.

The Pew report analyzed data on prison healthcare spending collected from 44 states by the U.S. Department of Justice. Those states spent $6.5 billion on prisoner healthcare in 2008 – a $2.3 billion increase compared to 2001. During the same time period, healthcare spending per prisoner also increased in 35 of the states.

The study reported a 94% increase in the number of state and federal prisoners age 55 and older during the seven-year period. Healthcare costs for older prisoners with chronic illnesses were an average of two to three times higher than the cost for younger prisoners, the report stated.

The Pew findings echo those of a June 2012 report by the American Civil Liberties Union, which found that of the nation's 1.5 million state and federal prisoners, around 246,600 were age 50 and over – about 16% of the overall prison population. The National Institute of Corrections (NIC) classifies prisoners over 50 as "aging" due to the stress of incarceration and typical lack of appropriate healthcare prior to and during incarceration. [See: PLN, April 2013, p.24].

The cost of keeping aging prisoners behind bars? An estimated $16 billion per year, including $3 billion in medical care, according to the ACLU.

"The number of elderly prisoners has absolutely exploded," stated Inimai Chettiar, who co-authored the ACLU report. Chettiar is a director at the Brennan Center for Justice at the NYU School of Law. She said by the year 2030, nearly a third of the entire prison population in the U.S. – upwards of 400,000 prisoners – will be elderly.

"Our extreme sentencing policies and a growing number of life sentences have effectively turned many of our correctional facilities into veritable nursing homes – and taxpayers are paying for it," the study noted.

"Incarceration is expensive," said David Fathi, who heads the ACLU's National Prison Project, "and incarcerating the elderly is extraordinarily expensive."

While it costs taxpayers approximately $34,100 per year on average to incarcerate a prisoner, it costs twice as much – $68,270 per year – to care for elderly prisoners. That is a major reason for state corrections spending growing by 674% over the last 25 years, the ACLU study determined. [See: PLN, Nov. 2012, p.22].

A 2012 report by Human Rights Watch reached similar conclusions. For example, in Georgia, the report said, the annual average cost of medical care for elderly prisoners was $8,565 compared to an annual average cost of just $961 for prisoners under age 65. In Michigan, the report documented healthcare for prisoners age 80 and older as high as $40,000 each.

The ACLU study identified five states with the highest percentages of aging prisoners: West Virginia (20%), New Hampshire (20%), Massachusetts (19%), Florida (18%) and Texas (18%). In fact, the report said, California, Texas and Florida combined accounted for 43% of the nation's entire elderly prison population.

Some older prisoners are serving short sentences for nonviolent crimes such as burglary or drug possession, the ACLU found; many are repeat offenders caught in the "revolving door" of the criminal justice system. Increasingly, the aging prison population is comprised of offenders who received long sentences for nonviolent crimes and are thus remaining in prison into their old age.

From 1986 to 1995, what the ACLU calls "the apex of the tough-on-crime period" of the U.S. criminal justice system, the number of prisoners sentenced to 20 or more years more than tripled, while from 1984 to 2002, life sentences – with or without parole – more than quadrupled.

"When you have people serving life sentences, they're going to die in prison, just like people serving 20-, 30- and 40-year sentences are inevitably going to grow old behind bars," noted Jamie Fellner, senior advisor of the U.S. Program at Human Rights Watch, in an interview with IPS News.

The majority of aging prisoners, according to the ACLU, are not serving time for murder. About 65% of Texas' elderly prisoners, for example, were incarcerated for drug and property offenses and other nonviolent crimes. In North Carolina, 26% of prisoners age 50 and over were incarcerated under habitual offender laws or for drug crimes, while another 14% were in prison for fraud, larceny, and traffic and public order offenses.

“Many individuals who would have been sentenced to shorter periods of incarceration for repeat crimes before 1979 are now caught in the net of later-enacted habitual offender laws and given punishments of 20 years or more,” the ACLU report observed.

While the ballooning expense of caring for a geriatric prison population has state and federal prison officials searching for ways to cope with the problems of providing—and paying for—healthcare for elderly prisoners, the ACLU and other advocacy groups have proposed alternatives to solve the growing dilemma.

Research has shown that by age 50, people are far less likely to commit crimes. Arrest rates are just over 2% at age 50 and almost nil at age 65. Prisoners age 50 or older are far less likely to recidivate than younger offenders. In New York, for example, only 7% of ex-offenders age 50 to 64 return to prison for new convictions. In Virginia, only 1.3% of ex-offenders over 55 committed new crimes and were reincarcerated.

“The risk of re-offense is much lower” after age 50, said Fathi. “Elderly prisoners are generally past their crime-prone years.”

Fellner agreed, stating in an August 18, 2013 editorial in The New York Times, “Those who are bedridden or in wheelchairs are not likely to go on crime sprees.”

She added, “It is worth asking: What do we as a society get from keeping these people in prison? People like the 87-year-old I met who had an ‘L’ painted on his left shoe and an ‘R’ on his right so he would know which was which and who didn’t even seem to know he was in prison. Or the old men I watched play bingo in a prison day room who needed staff members to put the markers on the bingo cards for them.”

The ACLU report recommended that parole boards grant conditional releases to elderly prisoners, using a “peer-reviewed, evidence-based risk assessment” to determine whether they pose a substantial risk to public safety. States should also “utilize and expand” medical parole, which usually requires prisoners to be terminally ill or physically incapacitated to be considered for release. While many states provide for medical parole, also known as compassionate release, they are rarely granted. [See: PLN, Feb. 2014, p.30; Jan. 2013, p.22; March 2012, p.12; Feb. 2012, p.16].

In one small step towards reform, U.S. Attorney General Eric Holder announced on August 12, 2013 that the Bureau of Prisons would institute new compassionate release policies for federal prisoners. Under the revised policies, elderly and infirm prisoners who have served a significant portion of their sentences, and who pose no danger to society, would be eligible for early release.

However, such measures have sparked resistance from victims’ rights advocates. “There are many criminals, especially violent criminals, for whom recidivism rates are very high and the propensity for reoffending is very high,” stated Kristy Dyroff, a spokeswoman for the National Organization for Victim Assistance.

“Our first priority is that victims are protected. It may be reasonable for a non-violent offender to be paroled,” Dyroff said, “but when there’s a possibility of violent re-offense, then we don’t support that.”

Beyond expanding the use of medical parole and compassionate release, more systemic reforms that would reduce the number of elderly prisoners include the repeal of mandatory minimum sentencing laws, habitual offender statutes and so-called truth-in-sentencing laws that require offenders to serve lengthy prison terms, the ACLU report concluded.

Several advocacy organizations have formed specifically to address issues related to elderly prisoners, such as Release Aging People in Prison, which focuses on older prisoners in New York, and the Project for Older Prisoners (POPS) at the George Washington University in Washington, D.C. ■

Idaho Supreme Court Vacates Summary Judgment for Pepper Spray Manufacturer

by Mark Wilson

ON AUGUST 27, 2013, IDAHO'S Supreme Court held that a lower state court improperly granted summary judgment to a pepper spray manufacturer on a prison guard's product liability and inadequate warning label claims.

While on light duty for bronchitis, Idaho prison guard Billie Jo Major participated in a March 3, 2008 training exercise that required her to enter a cell that had been sprayed with bursts of oleoresin capsicum (OC) from an MK-9 Fogger manufactured by Security Equipment Corporation (SEC). "The MK-9 Fogger produces a widely dispersed aerosol designed to irritate and inflame the respiratory tract."

Major alleged her respiratory problems worsened due to her exposure to the OC spray; she developed a chronic cough and claimed that "her health issues prevented her from working, caring for herself, or engaging in other activities."

Major sued SEC in Ada County district court, claiming that the MK-9 Fogger was unreasonably dangerous and had inadequate warning labels and instructions.

The district court granted summary judgment to SEC, finding that "Major failed to show a genuine issue of fact regarding chronic injury that resulted from exposure to the pepper spray," and that the MK-9 Fogger's "warning label provided an adequate notice to Major regarding the acute effects of the spray." The court also struck an affidavit from Major's expert witness as a sham affidavit because it contradicted his deposition testimony without explanation.

The Idaho Supreme Court reversed the grant of summary judgment on both the causation and inadequate warning label issues, finding material facts in dispute and holding "the district court improperly granted summary judgment to SEC on whether the company had a duty to warn Major of possible chronic injury."

The Supreme Court also reversed the district court's sham affidavit order, noting that credibility issues may not be resolved on a motion for summary judgment and that the Court had "never adopted the sham affidavit doctrine." Since "a sham affidavit finding necessarily turns on a credibility finding as well as a finding of bad faith," the Court held that was "beyond the power of the trial courts at the summary judgment phase." ## No "Reasonable Efforts" to Reunite Oregon Sex Offender with His Son

by Mark Wilson

THE OREGON COURT OF APPEALS HELD on July 3, 2013 that a juvenile court improperly assessed whether the Department of Human Services (DHS) had made reasonable efforts to reunite an incarcerated sex offender with his minor son.

At the time, DHS maintained custody of a child identified as R.W., who was born in 2007. His father, M.K., sentenced to prison for sex offenses involving a 15-year-old girl, was not scheduled for release until November 2013. M.K. participated in a parenting course and other programs while incarcerated.

Pursuant to ORS § 419B.476, at a juvenile court permanency hearing the court must "determine whether [DHS] has made reasonable efforts ... and whether the parent has made sufficient progress to make it possible for the ward to safely return home."

At an October 2012 permanency hearing, a DHS caseworker testified that the department wanted M.K. to visit with R.W., but required the father to complete a psychosexual evaluation to determine whether he could safely visit his son, in prison or following release, before approving visitation.

The caseworker noted that M.K. had not been evaluated but said she had located a doctor willing to perform the evaluation at the prison. However, the doctor's fee was "$5,000 to perform the psychosexual evaluation while [the] father was incarcerated, in comparison to the 'less than $1,000' that DHS usually would pay for such an evaluation."

The juvenile court held that DHS was not required to pay $5,000 to have M.K. evaluated and found that DHS had made reasonable efforts to reunite R.W. with M.K. "Reasonable efforts do not require [DHS] to offer [the father] a psychosexual evaluation while he is in prison if the cost is $5,000," the court found. Ultimately, the juvenile court concluded that M.K. had not made sufficient progress toward reunification with his son because he "is a sex offender and needs a psychosexual examination to determine whether he presents a danger" to R.W.

The Court of Appeals reversed, holding that the juvenile court failed to consider the totality of the circumstances in making its reasonable efforts determination.

"Put bluntly," the appellate court held, "when a parent contends that DHS's efforts have not been reasonable because the agency has declined to provide a particular service, the court's 'reasonable efforts' determination should include something resembling a cost-benefit analysis, at least when ... the agency itself has deemed that service to be 'key' to the reunification plan."

Such an analysis was not conducted by the juvenile court. Rather, it "appears to have considered only the cost of performing the psychosexual evaluation while the father is incarcerated," the Court of Appeals found. "Given the importance of the psychosexual evaluation to the reunification plan, the juvenile court should have considered the extent to which the family might benefit if

[the] father received a psychosexual evaluation promptly, instead of waiting a year to be evaluated after his release." The juvenile court's ruling was reversed. See: DHS v. M.K. (In re R.W.), 257 Ore. App. 409 (Or. Ct. App. 2013). ■

Pennsylvania Warrantless, Suspicionless Search Probation Condition Held Invalid

by Mark Wilson

THE PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT held that a condition of probation authorizing warrantless, suspicionless searches of a probationer's home was invalid, and remanded the case for resentencing.

On September 1, 2007, Philadelphia police witnessed David A. Wilson point a handgun at a driver in a parked car. He was arrested on gun and drug charges and tried in the Philadelphia Gun Court – a specialized court within the Court of Common Pleas.

Wilson was convicted and sentenced to 30-60 months in prison and a 36-month term of probation. "The trial court emphasized that there was no stricter probation than Gun Court probation." As a condition of probation, the court authorized warrantless, suspicionless searches of Wilson's residence for prohibited weapons.

The trial court rejected Wilson's objection to the search condition but a panel of the Superior Court later vacated the condition. On en banc review, however, the Superior Court reversed itself and affirmed "the search condition as it applied to the probationary sentence, but vacated the condition as it applied to 'the state parole aspect of the sentence.'" See: Commonwealth v. Wilson, 11 A.3d 519 (Pa Super. 2010).

The Supreme Court reversed, holding that "sentencing courts are not empowered to direct that a probation officer may conduct warrantless, suspicionless searches of a probationer as a condition of probation." As such, the Supreme Court found that the search condition of Wilson's probation violated 42 Pa.C.S. § 9912(d)(2), and remanded the case for resentencing.

The Court rejected Wilson's request to merely strike the search condition, because the trial court "made clear that it viewed the warrantless, suspicionless search condition of probation to be an integral part of the sentencing scheme." Therefore, "striking the condition, without remanding for resentencing, would be improper." See: Commonwealth of Pennsylvania v. Wilson, 67 A.3d 736 (Pa. 2013). ■

Lawsuit Against Missouri Jail Proceeds as Two Guards Plead Guilty

ATTORNEYS REPRESENTING CURRENT and former prisoners at the city workhouse in St. Louis, Missouri are moving forward with a federal lawsuit that alleges cruel and unusual punishment at the jail, including guards forcing prisoners to take part in “gladiator-style” fights.

On November 14, 2013, a motion to certify the case as a class-action was filed in the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Missouri.

The motion followed guilty pleas entered in August 2013 by two workhouse guards who had been accused of forcing prisoners to fight each other. The guards, Elvis M. Howard, 34, and Dexter Brinson, 46, pleaded guilty to charges of assault and obstruction of government operations. In addition, Howard pled guilty to burglary.

The American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) and other groups have complained for years about abuses in St. Louis’ jail system, according to Daniel Brown, one of the attorneys representing the prisoners in the federal lawsuit.

As far back as 2009, the ACLU of Missouri had released a report critical of conditions at the workhouse, citing assaults and cover-ups, and in August 2012 the organization called for an independent committee to provide oversight at the jail.

“What was happening was the guards were actually taking inmates out of the cells, placing them in cells with other inmates and forcing them to fight each other,” Brown said.

Guards allegedly bet on the fights, one of which reportedly involved a prisoner on suicide watch. Prisoners were sometimes offered incentives to battle each other, such as extra food, or were threatened with violence if they did not participate.

Brown noted the guilty pleas entered by the two jail guards proved the validity of the lawsuit, which was filed in August 2012 against the guards, the City of St. Louis and the St. Louis Department of Corrections. He also predicted that the scope of the suit would widen.

“Now that the guards have pled guilty, it’s no longer an allegation – it’s a fact,” Brown said. “We believe these aren’t the only two guards who did this.”

Howard and Brinson were arrested after they were observed on jail security cameras letting prisoner Thaddeus Dumas into prisoner Derrick Rodgers’ cell to watch them fight. In court pleadings, Dumas claimed that he was repeatedly threatened by guards and ordered to assault other prisoners.

The lawsuit, which seeks $150 million, originally named seven plaintiffs but grew to include 45-50 current and former prisoners after the attorneys for Dumas and Rodgers spoke with Paul Sims, a lawyer representing other prisoners at the workhouse. Those prisoners reported similar incidents that resulted in serious injuries, including a broken jaw, and claimed they were denied medical care.

“We believe once we are successful, we will be able to make a change in the way business is being done at the workhouse,” said Sims, who became the fourth attorney on the legal team representing the prisoners.

“We are looking for reform in the justice system and workhouse,” attorney Ryan Smith stated. “We mean the court to dictate to the city how these institutions should be run because obviously they don’t have it within themselves to run the facilities in a proper manner.”

The lawsuit also seeks changes in the way prisoners file complaints at the workhouse; currently, grievances are filed with the guards themselves.

“The complainers are complaining to the violators,” Smith said.

Howard and Brinson both received suspended sentences and were placed on probation; Howard was sentenced to three-and-a-half years while Brinson received four years. The charges of assault in the third degree and obstruction of government operations were both misdemeanors, while Howard’s charge of burglary in the first degree was a felony.

The federal lawsuit alleging constitutional violations at the St. Louis workhouse remains pending. See: Rodgers v. Brinson, U.S.D.C. (E.D. Mo.), Case No. 4:12-cv-01482-JCH.

In a related matter, St. Louis officials agreed to pay $1,384.50 to the ACLU of Missouri to settle a lawsuit accusing the city of failing to comply with a public records request concerning conditions at the jail.

On September 27, 2011, the ACLU had requested “any and all records relating to [the] inmate grievance process” from the city’s corrections department. A month later the ACLU was informed that a reply to its Sunshine Law request would be forthcoming in a few days; however, another month passed without any documents or other reply, and the ACLU filed suit.

“Our request for public records was – it wasn’t refused, it was ignored,” said Tony Rotherth, the ACLU’s legal director.

The request for documents was part of the ACLU’s investigation into complaints of neglect, abuse and poor conditions in the workhouse. At the time, the organization was working with then-Corrections Commissioner Gene Stubblefield to look into mismanagement and understaffing at the jail.

A series of escapes led to Stubblefield’s suspension in September 2011 and he was subsequently fired, ending the collaboration. In February 2014, Stubblefield filed a federal lawsuit against the city claiming that he was wrongly accused of misconduct and had been wrongfully terminated due to racial discrimination.

The ACLU received the documents it had requested shortly after filing suit. “After we filed the lawsuit, ... the city promptly owned up to its errors and gave up the records they had,” said Rotherth. “They are to be commended for owning up to their failure to comply with the Sunshine Law.”

On June 27, 2012, a Missouri state court approved a consent judgment that required the city to pay $1,148.50 to the ACLU in attorney fees and $236 in costs in the public records case. “You only get attorney fees and costs if [the violation is] knowing and purposeful,” Rotherth noted. See: ACLU of Eastern Missouri v. City of St. Louis, 22nd Judicial Circuit Court (MO), Case No. 1222-CC00423. ■

D.A. Drops Charges Against Oklahoma Parole Board Members

by Christopher Zoukis

FIVE MEMBERS OF THE OKLAHOMA Pardon and Parole Board (Board) will not face trial for criminal violations of the state's Open Meeting Act, after signing a statement acknowledging that they had conducted business without listing and publishing it on the agenda of the Board's meetings over a 14-month period.

As previously reported in PLN, the five members of the Board had been charged in March 2013 with violating state law by voting on prisoners' early release requests without proper public notice at meetings between May 2011 and July 2012. The Board members included Marc Dreyer, Currie Ballard, Richard L. Dugger, Lynnell Harkins and David Moore. [See: PLN, May 2013, p.30].

The Open Meeting Act requires notification of the time and place of meetings of public agencies and of the business that will be considered at the meetings; violations of the law can result in a $500 fine and up to a year in jail.

When the charges were first announced, Oklahoma City District Attorney David Prater issued a news release alleging that the Board had conducted business in a manner "designed to hide potentially unpopular actions from the citizens it serves." He had previously warned the Board that its actions were "egregious, aggravated, and a clear attempt to operate in secrecy, outside of public scrutiny."

The charges claimed the Board members had expedited the release of prisoners who had not yet served the minimum requirement of their sentences; Prater said the Board illegally placed the names of 50 prisoners on meeting agendas to consider them for early release. He stated some of the prisoners were convicted of murder, child molestation and other crimes that, by state law, required them to serve a minimum 85% of their sentences. Some were serving life sentences and at least one was serving life without parole.

Before filing charges, Prater had offered the Board members a chance to resign – an offer that was quickly rejected. "I'm not going anywhere," member Currie Ballard said at the time. "Until Jesus Christ calls me home, I'll be on the parole board."

In January 2014, after the Board members signed a one-page statement publicly accepting responsibility for violating state law, Prater said the issue should be settled quickly: "With the board's acknowledgement that their actions violated the Open Meeting Act, I anticipate a resolution of this matter in short order."

The statement maintained that the Board members thought they were doing nothing wrong. "The board was acting in good faith at the time, and believed that our actions were in accordance with the law. In retrospect, the procedure did not adequately promote the goal of insuring public notice before any action was taken by the board."

The statement echoed sentiments expressed by Oklahoma Governor Mary Fallin when the charges were first announced.

"The governor doesn't think there's any malicious intent in anything the Pardon and Parole Board was doing," said Alex Weintz, Fallin's communications director.

Top aides for Fallin had initially responded to Prater's accusations by saying he was confusing parole hearings with the Board's consideration of commutation requests. The Board didn't list the names of prisoners being considered for commutation but did announce their names during monthly meetings. The Attorney General's office had issued an opinion in October 2012 that said the Board could consider commutation requests submitted by prisoners before they were eligible for parole.

Despite the Board members' written acknowledgement that they had violated state law, no plans to replace any of the members have been announced. Of course, most people who break the law are not allowed to sign a statement admitting their wrongdoing and have the charges against them dropped. Most prosecutors would instead consider any such statement to be a confession, and proceed with the criminal case accordingly. ■

Kansas: Prison Healthcare Officials Engaged in Continued Deliberate Indifference

by Robert Warlick

THE KANSAS COURT OF APPEALS HELD that employees of Correct Care Solutions at the Lansing Correctional Facility (LCF) committed continuing Eighth Amendment violations by withholding a prisoner's medical restrictions.

LCF prisoner Ernest Lee Thomas, Jr., 61, had broken his ankle prior to his incarceration in 1989, resulting in arthritis and a permanent deformity. Consequently, he was granted a number of medical restrictions by prison healthcare staff: He was not to climb stairs, had a lower bunk restriction and was allowed to wear tennis shoes rather than regular prison-issued footwear.

Those restrictions continued until January 27, 2011, when Lamont Lane, an LCF nurse, removed them after Thomas failed to attend a medical appointment. Thomas was subsequently moved to a different housing unit that required him to climb a steep hill to reach his cell.

Thomas filed a petition in Leavenworth

District Court that alleged deliberate indifference to his "chronic and continuing medical conditions." The court held his Eighth Amendment rights had been violated when Nurse Lane removed his restrictions without permission from a physician, and noted the punishment for missing a medical appointment evidenced a "total 'disregard for the excessive risk to inmate health and safety.'"

However, the district court found that such deliberate indifference had been rectified and cured because a subsequent decision not to restore Thomas' medical restrictions was based on evaluations by two doctors and a review by Correct Care Solutions' regional medical director.

On appeal, Thomas argued that the removal of his medical restrictions should not have been upheld because the doctors' evaluations were not based on a change in his medical condition or healthcare procedures. The appellate court agreed, finding that Thomas' Eighth Amendment rights had continued to be violated when prison healthcare staff decided not to reinstate his longstanding medical restrictions.

"In the final analysis, we hold that because of the district court's initial finding and holding of an Eighth Amendment violation in the removal of all medical restrictions as conditions of Thomas' incarceration, it was legally erroneous to find and hold that the Eighth Amendment violation was rectified and extinguished by testimony that was not based on any objective change in Thomas' condition or some known institutional change in the medical standards of the [Department of Corrections]."

The Court of Appeals directed the district court to order the reinstatement of Thomas' medical restrictions. Thomas had not sought monetary damages, only injunctive relief. See: Thomas v. McKune, 298 P.3d 1138 (Kan. Ct. App. 2013). ■

Report: Increase in Federal Prison Population, Overcrowding

by Derek Gilna

A GOVERNMENT STUDY REVEALED THAT overcrowding in the federal prison system worsened over the five-year period from 2006 through 2011, affecting facilities of all security levels.

The study, conducted by the U.S. Government Accountability Office (GAO), warned that the growing population of the federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) threatens to result in increasingly negative effects for prisoners, staff and the prison system's infrastructure. The 85-page report further indicated that the increase in the number of federal prisoners coincided with actions by various states to not only reduce their prison populations but also lower their crime rates and cut costly corrections budgets.

The GAO report found the increase in the federal prison population occurred despite the addition of thousands of beds due to the opening of five new federal facilities. At the same time, four federal minimum-security camps closed.

According to the study, federal prisons were 39% over capacity as of September 2011. Further, the report predicted that overcrowding would climb to more than 45% above the BOP's maximum capacity by 2018.

The GAO warned that prisons may experience rising rates of violence among prisoners and growing levels of stress among prison staff because overcrowding contributes "to increased inmate misconduct, which negatively affects the safety and security of inmates and staff."

"If you start cramming more and more people into a confined space, you're going to create more tensions and problems," noted David Maurer, director of Homeland Security and Justice Issues for the GAO. "It creates the possibility that someone's going to snap and have a violent incident."

The BOP said its "rated capacity" – the term used to describe maximum population levels – requires 25% double bunking and 75% single bunking in high-security cells; 50% double bunking and 50% single bunking in medium-security prisons; and 100% double bunking in low- and minimum-security facilities.

Overcrowding also puts a strain on prison infrastructure such as dining halls, bathrooms, laundry rooms and even television rooms, which become more difficult to access. Some institutions have even had to reduce prisoners' visitation time.

"Some of this sounds small and trivial," Maurer said, "but it adds up."

Additionally, "nearly all BOP facilities had fewer correctional staff on board than needed, with a BOP-wide staffing shortage in excess of 3,200 ... [and] there was also anecdotal evidence that understaffing was stressing the workforce."

The GAO noted that "population pressures on both staffing levels and inmate living space have an upward impact on serious prison violence," although system-wide violence rates had remained stable.

According to statistics compiled by the Council of Prison Locals, the union representing about 32,000 federal prison employees, nearly 60 guards were assaulted by prisoners from January to September 2012, and 14 of those attacks involved weapons.

The GAO also reviewed the BOP's efforts to use its statutory authority to help mitigate the effects of the growing federal prison population, including the Residential Drug Abuse Program (RDAP), utilization of sentence credits for GED participation and increased halfway house placement pursuant to the Second Chance Act. While such efforts were covered more extensively in a separate report, the GAO study focused on the "effects of population growth and prison crowding on BOP operations," including "available bed space, inmate program participation and waiting lists, inmate-to-staff ratios, and available infrastructure costs."

The reduction in rehabilitative and reentry services is another source of frustration for prisoners. Programs such as RDAP – which in theory can shave up to a year off a prisoner's sentence – and vocational training courses often have lengthy waiting lists.

"People will get out of prison, but they're not being helped to reenter society," stated Inimai Chettiar with the Brennan Center for Justice at the New York University School of Law. "People are going to recidivate more when they get out of horrendous [prison] conditions without job training and development programs to get their lives back together."

The GAO warned that federal prison overcrowding shows no sign of abating. The "BOP's 2010 long-range capacity plan assumes continued growth in the federal prison population from fiscal years 2011 through 2020, with about 15 percent growth in the number of inmates BOP will house," the report stated.

The GAO study did not discount the fact that in the future, "courts might require BOP to address conditions related to crowding, or that the [American Correctional Association] might revoke the accreditation of BOP institutions."

In contrast, the GAO noted that some states had reduced their prison populations to ease overcrowding, stating "the overall growth of the state inmate population began to decline in 2009." Kansas, Mississippi, New York, Ohio and Wisconsin were cited as examples of states making good progress in reducing incarceration levels and overcrowding in their prison systems; as a result of state prison population reductions, there have been a number of prison closures nationwide. [See: PLN, June 2013, p.1].

The GAO found that in comparison to the five selected states, federal sentencing laws, mandatory minimums and the absence of parole in the federal prison system have limited the BOP's flexibility to "significantly modify" a prisoner's sentence. In contrast, the selected states have increased sentence reduction credits for positive behavior and completion of faith-based, vocational, drug treatment and "other constructive program[s] with specific performance standards.”

“[The report] pointed out exactly what we assumed,” said U.S. Rep. Bobby Scott, who has been critical of mandatory minimum sentences. “With more inmates, [prison officials] focus more on security and less on the programs that can rehabilitate the prisoners.”

Overall, the GAO report did not so much blame the BOP for an increasing number of prisoners, overcrowding and associated problems as highlight what many corrections experts acknowledge is a continuing and unsustainable trend. It is also an expensive trend.

According to a report released by the Congressional Research Service on March 4, 2014, “The burgeoning federal prison population has led Congress to increase appropriations for the BOP’s operations and infrastructure. In FY1980, Congress appropriated $330.0 million for the BOP. By FY2014, the total appropriation for the BOP reached $6.859 billion.”

The Congressional Research Service noted that “Congress could choose to mitigate some of the issues related to federal prison population growth by appropriating more funding so the BOP could expand prison capacity to alleviate overcrowding, but this would only continue the upward climb in the BOP’s appropriations.” Alternatively, “Congress could also consider ways to reduce the number of inmates held in federal prison through methods such as increasing good time credit for inmates who participate in certain rehabilitative programs, placing more low-level offenders on community supervision in lieu of incarceration, or reducing mandatory minimum penalties for some offenses.”

The federal prison population reached

216,265 in mid-April 2014, inclusive of offenders in community-based facilities. ■

Liberty Interest Necessary to Trigger Arkansas Judicial Review

by Mark Wilson

THE ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT HAS upheld the dismissal of a prisoner’s state judicial review action because he failed to assert a constitutional violation.

Arkansas Department of Corrections (ADC) prisoner James Chadwick Renfro said he had entered into an agreement with prison officials that allowed him to make and send greeting cards as a hobby craft. However, the ADC subsequently implemented an administrative directive that changed the rules governing that privilege. Prison officials then relied on the new directive to impose and uphold a disciplinary action against Renfro for what he claimed would have been allowable conduct under the original agreement. He also argued the disciplinary action violated applicable ADC rules.

Renfro brought a state judicial review and declaratory judgment suit challenging the dismissal of his disciplinary grievance, the application of the new administrative directive and prison policies which allegedly violated ADC officials’ contractual obligations.

The circuit court denied relief, concluding that Renfro’s suit “was barred under the Arkansas Administrative Review Act, codified as Arkansas Code Annotated sections 25-15-201 to -217 ... because the Act specifically exempts inmate actions and [Renfro] failed to state facts regarding the alleged violation sufficient to create a liberty interest protected by the Due Process Clause.”

Conducting a de novo review, the Arkansas Supreme Court noted that in Clinton v. Bonds, 306 Ark. 554, 816 S.W.2d 169 (Ark. 1991), it had held the Act “unconstitutional to the extent that it deprived inmates of review of constitutional questions.” Thus, when a prisoner “challenges a disciplinary proceeding and the ADC officials’ implementation of ADC rules, the petitioner must raise a constitutional question sufficient to raise a liberty interest merely to fall within the classification of claims subject to judicial review.”

Although Renfro argued “that he lost his craft tools and supplies, income, and certain privileges,” the Court held that none of his claims was “sufficient to assert a deprivation of a liberty interest.”

The Supreme Court concluded that Renfro had “failed to sustain a claim under section 25-15-212 to support a judicial review of the ADC’s decision,” and the dismissal of his suit was therefore affirmed. See: Renfro v. Smith, 2013 Ark. 40 (Ark. 2013). ■

Seventh Circuit: Prisoner with Back Condition Stated Claim for Fall from Upper Bunk

by Michael Brodheim

THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS held that a prisoner who suffers from scoliosis stated a claim for deliberate indifference when he alleged that he fell and injured himself trying to climb into an upper bunk bed after specifically complaining that, due to back pain, he wasn't able to access the upper bunk.

In January 2009, Illinois state prisoner Dorcus Withers filed suit pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983, alleging that various health-care professionals had been deliberately indifferent to his serious medical needs in violation of the Eighth Amendment's ban on cruel and unusual punishment. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants.

On appeal, the Seventh Circuit noted that although Withers suffered from scoliosis (i.e., curvature of the spine) and "frequent flare-ups" of back pain, the evidence was "overwhelming" that he was also a malingerer and had no medical need for a back brace, a medical mattress or orthopedic shoes – some of the items he repeatedly requested.

The Court of Appeals was troubled, however, by an encounter between Withers and prison nurse Debra Miller. According to Withers, Miller had denied his request to let him stay overnight in the prison's Health Care Unit despite his report of back pain; she then returned him to his cell in a wheelchair. When he told her that he wouldn't be able to climb into his upper bunk, she replied that he'd "figure it out" and left. Withers claimed he then fell and injured himself trying to climb into the upper bunk, which was not equipped with a ladder.

The appellate court wrote that "Even if all the plaintiff's allegations are true ... they don't make a conclusive case of deliberate indifference. The nurse may, in light of the plaintiff's record of malingering, have believed that he would have no difficulty climbing to the upper bunk, or at least that he would not fall and hurt himself. She may have believed he was just trying to lie his way into a more comfortable bed in the Health Care Unit."

Regardless, the Seventh Circuit held that Withers' claim related to his fall from the upper bunk may have merit, and there was at least a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Nurse Miller was deliberately indifferent to his medical needs in that regard. All other aspects of the lower court's summary judgment order were affirmed. See: Withers v. Wexford Health Services, Inc., 710 F.3d 688 (7th Cir. 2013).

Following remand, the district court entered summary judgment in favor of the defendants on February 12, 2014, dismissing the case. The court found that Nurse Miller was not deliberately indifferent to Withers' medical condition, noting that he had a mild form of scoliosis, may have exaggerated his condition and did not suffer any significant injuries. Further, the district court held that even if Withers' allegations were true he could at most demonstrate negligence, which does not support an Eighth Amendment claim. See: Withers v. Wexford Health Services, Inc., U.S.D.C. (C.D. Ill.), Case No. 1:09-cv-01035-HAB-JAG. ■

High-Ranking Illinois Prison Official Fired due to Criminal History

ACCORDING TO COURT RECORDS OBTAINED by the Chicago Sun Times, Xadrian R. McCraven, 44, has a lengthy criminal history that includes a 1987 conviction for disorderly conduct, a 1989 conviction for illegal possession of a handgun and a conviction in 1998 for reckless conduct related to a domestic battery case. Plus around two dozen arrests in his youth for offenses that ranged from arson and aggravated assault to attempted robbery and drug possession.

McCraven applied for a job with the Chicago Police Department, but was rejected due to his criminal history. He unsuccessfully argued in federal court that his record should not have been considered because the arrests had been expunged.

His lawsuit was dismissed, with the court finding there was no proof the police background check was improper or that the department had discriminated against him due to his race. A magistrate wrote in an August 2000 ruling that the police background investigation found McCraven was known "to be a drug dealer, gang member and a supplier of guns to other gangs."

But that didn't stop him from subsequently obtaining jobs with the Chicago Housing Authority Police Department, the Illinois Department of Professional Regulations and the Illinois Department of Children and Family Services (DCFS).

He applied for a position with the Illinois Department of Corrections (IDOC) in 2007, and was rejected. Regardless, in 2011, while employed with the DCFS, he was assigned to work in the prison system's intelligence unit for two months – before the assignment was terminated due to "suitability issues" uncovered in a background check. McCraven had admitted in a job application that he was a gang member in the 1980s, reportedly with the Young Latino Organization Disciples.

According to a wrongful termination suit filed by McCraven, he was fired from the DCFS in 2012 after an investigation found he was “writing and responding to hundreds of lewd and inappropriate emails” at work and had falsified information on a job application.

His lawsuit was dismissed, but McCraven settled a union grievance with state officials in June 2013 and received a 10-day suspension. He also received six months back pay and was transferred to the Department of Corrections, where he landed a $111,432-a-year job as a senior advisor to the IDOC’s chief of parole.

After McCraven’s criminal record was exposed by the Sun Times, IDOC spokesman Tom Shaer said McCraven was placed on paid leave in December 2013 and scheduled for a pre-disciplinary hearing.

“In the hearing, the Department of Corrections will provide its reasoning for seeking discipline against the employee, and the employee can provide his rebuttal,” said Shaer. “If termination is pursued, an employee is suspended without pay pending the termination process,” he added.

McCraven was fired from his position with the IDOC on January 6, 2014 due to “inconsistencies in employment applications.”

Several days later, state Senator Kirk Dillard called on Governor Pat Quinn to remove IDOC director Salvador Godinez in connection with the McCraven scandal. Godinez’s chief of staff had signed off on McCraven’s 2013 hiring despite his criminal record, prior gang membership and a finding that he was not eligible for a position in the IDOC because his nephew was on parole at the time.

“It’s outrageous that former gang members are now running the prisons,” said Dillard. “No matter if you’re a Democrat or Republican, from Chicago or Cairo, this is just plain wrong and dangerous.”

Senator Dillard and other lawmakers have questioned whether McCraven obtained his state job positions through political influence. McCraven was hired under former Governor Rod Blagojevich’s administration; Blagojevich was impeached, removed from office and prosecuted on corruption charges, including soliciting bribes for political appointments. He was sentenced in December 2011 to 14 years in federal prison.

Governor Quinn has expressed his support for Godinez. Meanwhile, two Illinois state legislators – one a former prosecutor and the other a former police officer – have proposed a bill that would prohibit anyone who is “documented to have been a member of a criminal gang” from being hired by the IDOC, State Police, DCFS and Department of Juvenile Justice. ■

California: Surety Entitled to Exoneration of Bail Bond Forfeited as a Result of Defendant’s Deportation

by Michael Brodheim

THE CALIFORNIA COURT OF APPEAL HAS held that a bail surety did not forfeit the bond it posted for a defendant who was deported before he could appear in court to answer the underlying criminal charge against him.

In June 2011, Financial Casualty & Surety, Inc. (Financial) posted a $100,000 bond for the release of Luciano Villa, who had been charged with driving under the influence. Villa was deported two days after the bond was posted, which made it impossible for him to appear in court. As a result, his bail was forfeited.

Financial sought to have the forfeiture vacated and its bond exonerated. The trial court found the company did not meet the statutory requirements set forth in Penal Code Section 1305(d) for exoneration of a forfeited bail bond, even when the defendant had been deported.

Specifically, the court held that because Financial “had full knowledge” of Villa’s immigration status when it posted a bond on his behalf, it had “unclean hands” and “should [therefore] be held responsible” for the bond forfeiture.

The Court of Appeal reversed, finding the trial court had “applied the wrong legal standard when it used the clean hands doctrine to deny Financial’s motion to vacate the order of forfeiture.” Even assuming Financial “should have known” that Villa would likely be deported after he was released on bond, that did not mean the company “connived” in his deportation.

Under the plain meaning of the statute, exoneration is mandatory absent “connivance of the bail” and the doctrine of clean hands had no relevance in this context, the appellate court wrote. # Philadelphia Sued Over Rejection of Ad Criticizing U.S. Incarceration Policies

by Michael Brodheim

ON MAY 20, 2013, A FEDERAL DISTRICT court in Pennsylvania denied the City of Philadelphia's motion to dismiss in a case brought by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and ACLU, challenging the city's policy related to advertising at the Philadelphia International Airport.

In April 2011, the NAACP had released a report titled "Misplaced Priorities," which espoused the view that the United States overspends on incarceration at the expense of education and proposed specific reforms to reverse that trend. Seeking to increase public awareness, the NAACP prepared ads to display at airports around the country. The ad that the organization proposed to post at the Philadelphia International Airport read, in relevant part, "Welcome to America, home to 5% of the world's people & 25% of the world's prisoners. Let's build a better America together."

City officials rejected the ad, claiming that they did not accept "issue" or "advocacy" advertisements, which prompted the NAACP and ACLU of Pennsylvania to file suit on First Amendment and state constitutional grounds. [See: PLN, April 2012, p.50].

The NAACP noted that "other issue-oriented, educational, and advocacy advertisements" had been displayed at Philadelphia's airport, including ads related to wildlife preservation, global warming, racial equality and supporting U.S. military troops.

"The government cannot pick and choose which speech it deems acceptable and which it does not," stated Chris Hansen, senior staff attorney for the ACLU's Speech, Privacy and Technology Project. "The fact that the airport accepted some political issue ads but not the NAACP's shows the arbitrary nature of the city's unwritten and undefined policy. It is a clear violation of the First Amendment's prohibition against the government favoring some speakers over others."

The city subsequently agreed to post the NAACP's ad at the airport, but only for three months. In March 2012, Philadelphia officials adopted a written policy prohibiting political and noncommercial advertising at the airport. In response the NAACP filed an amended complaint challenging the new policy. The city then filed a motion to dismiss, arguing that its airport ad policy was viewpoint-neutral and a reasonable regulation, and thus not unconstitutional.

The district court rejected the city's argument as premature. In order to determine whether the city's restriction on speech in airport advertisements is constitutional, the court stated it must first determine whether the airport is a private forum or designated public forum, as different standards of judicial scrutiny apply. The city argued for the former classification while the NAACP argued for the latter.

"The walls of Philadelphia International Airport are public space, and the city officials do not have the right to suppress any group's viewpoint based on their own beliefs or political considerations," said NAACP general counsel Kim Keenan.

In the absence of a developed factual record from which it could determine the appropriate forum classification, the district court denied the city's motion to dismiss.

This case remains pending, with the parties filing cross-motions for summary judgment in early November 2013. See: NAACP v. City of Philadelphia, U.S.D.C. (E.D. Penn.), Case No. 2:11-cv-06533-CMR; 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 71332. ■

DC Circuit: Federal Prisoner not Limited to Seeking Relief via Habeas Corpus

by Michael Brodheim

THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CIRCUIT Court of Appeals has held that a federal prisoner may seek relief via means other than habeas corpus, so long as success on the merits of the claim does not "necessarily imply the invalidity of confinement or shorten its duration."

In 1993, Brian A. Davis was convicted of drug-related offenses involving both powder and crack cocaine. At that time the federal sentencing guidelines treated 1 gram of crack cocaine the same, for sentencing purposes, as 100 grams of powder cocaine, resulting in a 100:1 sentencing disparity. Davis received a life sentence, later reduced to 30 years in federal prison.

In 2007 and again in 2010, both Congress and the U.S. Sentencing Commission took steps to reduce the sentencing disparity related to crack and powder cocaine (the current ratio is 18:1 under the Fair Sentencing Act). Unfortunately for Davis, those efforts only included crimes involving amounts of cocaine less than the amounts involved in his offenses.

In 2011, Davis filed suit under Bivens and the Declaratory Judgment Act, 28 U.S.C. § 2201(a), seeking a declaration that he was denied equal protection under the law because Congress and the Sentencing Commission had failed to reduce the sentencing disparity for defendants – like himself – who were convicted of crimes involving larger amounts of crack cocaine.

Davis sought to "compel the Commission to reinstate its proposed 1995 amendments" to the federal sentencing guidelines, which would have created a 1:1 sentencing ratio for crack and powder cocaine offenses. Congress had expressly rejected the proposed amendments when it passed Public Law 104-38.

The district court dismissed Davis' lawsuit on the grounds that the relief he requested was only available, if at all, via a petition for habeas corpus.

The D.C. Circuit reversed, holding that Supreme Court precedent "channeled" prisoners' claims for relief into habeas petitions only if the remedy sought was within "the 'core of habeas.'" Citing Wilkinson v. Austin, 544 U.S. 74 (2005) [PLN, Aug. 2005, p.24], the appellate court concluded that a habeas petition was required only if success on the merits of the claim would "necessarily imply the invalidity of confinement or shorten its duration.”

The Court of Appeals reasoned that success for Davis would not “necessarily” lead to a decrease in his prison term, because even if he prevailed on his equal protection challenge the district court would still retain the discretion to deny him a sentence reduction. The Court also found that Davis could proceed on his Bivens action, while remarking that his Bivens claim was “admittedly flawed ... and possibly fatally so.” See: Davis v. United States Sentencing Commission, 716 F.3d 660 (D.C. Cir. 2013).

Following remand, the district court granted the Sentencing Commission’s motion to dismiss on April 11, 2014, noting that federal circuit courts had found no constitutional equal protection violation in Congress’ refusal to enact the Commission’s 1995 proposed amendments, and that Davis had failed to cite authority to support his argument other than a concurring opinion in a Second Circuit case. See: Davis v. United States Sentencing Commission, U.S.D.C. (D. D.C.), Case No. 1:11-cv-01433-JEB. ■

Massachusetts DOC, Hospital Officials Disciplined in Prisoner’s Death

by Derek Gilna

AN INVESTIGATIVE REPORT ORDERED BY Massachusetts Governor Deval Patrick into what he termed the “disgusting” death of a mentally-ill prisoner at Bridgewater State Hospital found not only numerous policy violations, but also evidence of a cover-up of the facts surrounding the death. As a result, three guards and three high-ranking Department of Correction (DOC) officials were disciplined.

Patrick was prompted to investigate the 2009 death of state prisoner Joshua K. Messier following a Boston Globe article that described delays and misleading information provided by DOC officials in response to media inquiries. The investigation was conducted by Public Safety Secretary Andrea Cabral.

Messier, who was reportedly disruptive, had been placed on his bed in four-point restraints. Two guards then pushed his chest almost to his knees in a move called “suitcasing,” and he died of a heart attack shortly thereafter.

Bridgewater superintendent Karin Bergeron, who was required to investigate and report on prisoners’ deaths, tried to avoid issuing written findings that might embarrass the DOC and Bridgewater. She attempted to arrange a phone conference regarding Messier’s death to avoid filing a written report. She also requested repeated extensions of time to file her report, even though an autopsy determined the death was a homicide and other reports found Messier had suffered blunt force trauma.

Bergeron is no longer employed with the state.

Secretary Cabral’s investigation determined that Bridgewater officials misled a watchdog agency, the Disability Law Center, by saying the guards involved in Messier’s death had been cleared by a Plymouth County grand jury, when in fact the case was never submitted to the grand jury. Cabral said former DOC Commissioner Harold W. Clarke, who now heads Virginia’s prison system, was unhelpful during the investigation.

Current Bridgewater superintendent Robert F. Murphy was reprimanded for delaying completion of a required report on the guards’ use of force until several years after Messier’s death. Correction Commissioner Luis S. Spencer also was reprimanded, and Assistant Deputy Commissioner Karen Hetherson was asked to resign. She had overruled an internal affairs report that cited two DOC guards for misconduct.

Further, three guards were placed on paid administrative leave as a result of Secretary Cabral’s investigation – Derek Howard and John C. Raposo for improper use of force when restraining Messier, and a third guard for failing to properly supervise them. ■

Washington County Jail Remains Closed after Voters Reject Tax Hike

OFFICIALS IN YAKIMA COUNTY, Washington say a deal struck with the city of Fife, near Tacoma, to house the city's prisoners will help make up for lost income from an empty county jail that failed to win the support of voters in a 2012 tax referendum.

Yakima County Department of Corrections director Ed Campbell said he hopes the contract to house prisoners from Fife will be the first of many. He noted the contract, announced in April 2013, should generate $700,000 in annual revenue.

"The market is certainly different," he said. "It's very competitive, very tough, and there's very little need for beds compared to what it used to be so we continue to try to work towards getting contracts."

The city of Fife will send low-risk prisoners to Yakima County's main jail, according to County Commissioner Mike Leita. "We have certainty from them that these will be the lowest level of, best type of inmates if you will, therefore they afforded a very good rate."

The scramble for contracts for prisoners from other jurisdictions followed the August 2012 rejection by Yakima County residents of a proposed one-tenth-of-a-cent sales tax hike. The measure was rejected by more than 53% of voters.

County commissioners had requested the tax increase to cover $3 million in annual debt payments on three bond issues, including one from 2002 to build Yakima's newest jail on Pacific Avenue. The 288-bed jail was built specifically to generate revenue, with local officials counting on other cities and counties to house their prisoners at the facility. But those other jurisdictions withdrew their prisoners in 2010, having found alternatives to incarceration to cut costs.

As a result, Campbell closed the Pacific Avenue jail, laid off employees and reduced expenses for prisoner healthcare and food at the main jail, slashing his budget by more than $12 million. The Pacific Avenue jail has remained closed since 2011; around $17 million is still owed on its construction costs.

The other two outstanding jail bonds were for security upgrades at Yakima's main 950-bed downtown jail and the remodeling more than a decade ago of a former bowling alley to be used as a minimum-security facility.

One Yakima County official blamed the economy for the rejection of the sales tax increase.

"In these difficult times, it is asking a lot of the taxpayers to willingly increase their taxes," said County Commissioner Rand Elliott. "They have expressed themselves and we will move on to our next option."

The contract with Fife means about three dozen beds at Yakima County's main jail should be filled, which will make up a small amount of the revenue lost when the Pacific Avenue jail closed. County officials said they also planned to transfer $2.8 million from the county's road fund to the general fund to cover the budget shortfall.

In the meantime, talks began in early 2014 between Yakima County and the State of Washington, which needs to find beds for around 300 minimum- and medium-security prisoners. Housing those prisoners will cost about $7 million per year, and the legislature passed a bill in 2013 that allows state prisoners to be held in county jails in the wake of budget cuts that led to the closure of three prisons.

In April 2014, the Yakima Herald-Republic reported that the legislature had approved a one year, $1.5 million contract to house 75 female state prisoners in Yakima County, which may lead to the reopening of the Pacific Avenue jail.

"We're looking at investigating every opportunity to house inmates at the lowest possible rate," said state Rep. Charles Ross. "With Yakima sitting there with an empty facility, [it is] an attractive place for the state."

Due to the state contract and renewed interest by other cities and counties to house their prisoners in Yakima County, Campbell said he was "cautiously optimistic" the Pacific Avenue jail would reopen by the end of 2014. ■

State of Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign!

Prison Phone Justice Project needs your help for statewide campaign!

While much progress has been made in reducing the costs of long distance prison calls, we are still fighting to reduce the high costs of in-state prison and jail calls at the local level. In January 2014, the Human Rights Defense Center (HRDC), the parent organization of Prison Legal News, reopened its Seattle office to launch the Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign.

This is our first statewide phone justice campaign, and we're excited to have people involved on both the local and national levels who are dedicated to ending the exorbitant phone rates and kickbacks associated with the prison phone industry. David Ganim, HRDC's national Prison Phone Justice Director, has already been obtaining the phone contracts and rates for all 39 county jails in Washington, as well as data from the Washington Department of Corrections.

We recently hired a local campaign director, Carrie Wilkinson, who will manage our office in Seattle and coordinate the statewide campaign. Washington prisoners and their families pay some of the highest phone rates in the nation, and we need your help to win this battle!

Here's how you can help – first, please visit the Washington campaign website:

There you can see all the ways you can make a difference. The site allows you to sign up for the campaign and upload videos and share blog entries about how high prison phone rates make it difficult for you to stay in touch with your incarcerated loved ones. You can also upload an audio message, and even call in your story to 1-877-410-4863, toll-free 24 hours a day, seven days a week! We need to hear how you and your family have been affected by high prison phone rates. If you don't have Internet access, you can mail us a letter describing your experiences and we'll post it. Send letters to HRDC's main office at: HRDC, Attn: WA Phone Justice Campaign, P.O. Box 1151, Lake Worth, FL 33460. Washington state prisoners can mail us letters and send a copy of this notice to their family members so they can get involved.

By choosing to participate in the Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign, you will be playing a key role in ending the unfair phone rates that prisoners' families have to pay. We cannot win this battle without your help, so please visit the campaign website and share your experiences! Donations are also welcome and greatly appreciated, and can be mailed to the above address or made online via the campaign site. Thank you for your support!

News in Brief

District of Columbia: Before sending former jail guard Jonathan Womble to prison for just over three years on October 9, 2013, U.S. District Court Judge Reggie Walton called Womble's crime "reprehensible and one of the most serious anyone could commit." Heroin, marijuana, and a cell phone and charger were some of the contraband that Womble had smuggled into the D.C. jail in exchange for cash bribes. [See: PLN, Sept. 2013, p.56]. Since 2010, 138 cell phones have been found in the D.C. jail – and staff corruption is apparently one way they are getting into the facility.

Dubai: According to a September 30, 2013 news report, prisoner Ayoub A.Y. was stabbed and beaten to death by a gang of multi-national prisoners who cut off his ear and his finger before killing him. On April 24, 2014 a special tribunal acquitted 18 of the prisoners accused of Ayoub's murder. An unnamed 21-year-old police officer was fired in connection with the incident; he left a gate open as he ran toward the disturbance that allowed other prisoners to rush into the unit.

Florida: Guard Vincent Taylor resigned from his position at the West Tampa Detention Center on September 17, 2013 after he violated Department of Juvenile Justice policy when he brought his cell phone into the facility. Taylor allegedly allowed three juvenile offenders to use his phone to post pictures of themselves on Facebook. Another employee at the state-operated detention center, supervisor Charlie Whitehead, resigned in May 2013 for policy violations that included use of excessive force.

Florida: Two former state prison guards were arrested on September 25 and 26, 2013, and face charges of official misconduct. Erik Boe and Leon Brown were investigated after Ryan Anderson, a prisoner at a work release center in West Palm Beach, called 911 to file a complaint against them. They allegedly demanded that Anderson pay them to avoid being accused of selling drugs; he initially paid $370, but Boe and Brown told him they wanted more money.

Georgia: Channel 2 Action News confirmed on September 9, 2013 that an unnamed Fulton County Sheriff's Office employee was disciplined following a prisoner's escape from the North County Jail Annex in Alpharetta. A deputy was seen on surveillance video as the last person to handle an exterior door through which Michael Shawn Wilson escaped, and an investigation determined that deputies had put tape over the latches of certain locks, rendering them inoperable. Assistant City Administrator James Drinkard noted that concerns had been raised about door locks that could not be controlled remotely; he said he believed the problem had since been resolved.

Georgia: Dustin Blake Otwell, 31, a former jailer for the city of Smyrna, was sentenced to 10 years in prison after he altered the personal property documents of an arrestee and stole the man's money. Otwell was unaware that the arresting police officer had counted the $600 in cash while his patrol car's video camera recorded. The former jail guard tried to blame the officer for the theft. The Associated Press reported on September 11, 2013 that a Cobb County judge had ordered Otwell to serve at least two years of his sentence.

Hawaii: According to an October 1, 2013 news report, 17 Hawaii prisoners were removed from the Halawa Correctional Facility and mainland prisons and transferred to federal custody after an investigation into bribery and corruption among prison guards and members of the USO Family gang resulted in federal indictments. Guards John Joseph Kalei Hall and Feso Malufau are accused of receiving thousands of dollars in bribes to smuggle cigarettes and drugs into the Halawa prison for distribution by gang members. The guards, who face multiple charges, both lost their jobs; Hall had already been sentenced to 13 months in federal prison. [See: PLN, Jan. 2014, p.56]. Around eight of the prisoners sent to the Honolulu Federal Detention Center to await trial later went on a hunger strike to protest poor conditions at the facility.

Illinois: Cook County Jail prisoner Roosevelt Gray, 26, collapsed on September 26, 2013 as he was being released after serving a two-day sentence for driving on a suspended license. Gray was alert when transported to a nearby hospital but died later that morning. The medical examiner's office ruled his death was natural, resulting from pulmonary thromboembolism, deep vein thrombosis and obesity.

Kansas: On September 5, 2013, Sedgwick County Sheriff Jeff Easter announced that an unnamed detention deputy had been arrested in connection with the theft and unauthorized use of a $50 debit card belonging to a prisoner who was transferred to a work release facility. The prisoner complained about the missing card and the ensuing investigation revealed surveillance video that showed a uniformed deputy using the card to purchase $50 worth of items at a store about eight hours after the prisoner had been moved. The deputy bonded out of jail and was placed on administrative leave.

Kentucky: Narcotics detectives from the Kentucky State Police arrested Donna S. Hunter, 60, on September 20, 2013. She was charged in connection with smuggling cigarettes and drugs into the Madison County Detention Center, where she worked in the facility's kitchen. The investigation resulted in charges of promoting contraband, prescription substance not in proper container and trafficking in a controlled substance. Hunter pleaded guilty and was sentenced on April 3, 2014 to a year in prison.

Louisiana: As Tropical Storm Karen approached on October 4, 2013, Orleans Parish Sheriff Marlin N. Gusman transferred 432 prisoners from temporary tent housing to State Department of Public Safety and Corrections facilities. In a prepared statement, the sheriff said his office had also released 70 prisoners who were being held on minor charges in advance of the storm, and that the jail would stop accepting new prisoners for municipal or traffic violations. The Orleans Parish Prison had been severely damaged by Hurricane Katrina in 2005. [See: PLN, April 2007, p.1].

Maryland: On September 9, 2013, Judge Jerome R. Spencer sentenced former Charles County jail guard Michael Anderson Hurd to a 25-year prison term, then suspended all but seven years of the sentence. Hurd had entered an Alford plea to one of six counts of child sex abuse and prosecutors dropped the remaining charges as part of the plea agreement. Following the sentencing, several people who identified themselves as fellow jail guards called the Maryland Independent claiming that Hurd was given preferential treatment. The anonymous callers alleged that Hurd's family had close ties with Charles County Sheriff Rex Coffey and expressed outrage that, as a result of that relationship, Hurd had been allowed to draw a paycheck while being held without bond and was allowed to resign instead of being fired.

Michigan: Kent County jail guard Jaclynn Rodriguez was fired on September 23, 2013 for "failure to pass probation" following an internal investigation into a September 2012 incident in which she was attacked by prisoner Willie Lee Wilson. Jail surveillance video showed Rodriguez being knocked to the ground and strangled. Several prisoners came to her aid, and Kent County Prosecutor Robin Eslinger said their actions had kept Wilson from killing Rodriguez. Wilson was found guilty of attempted murder as a result of the assault and sentenced to 80 to 160 years.

Mississippi: Two men have been sentenced for building a pipe bomb discovered in a car at the South Mississippi Correctional Institution. Scott Jenkins Waits and John Eric Harberson were indicted on June 25, 2013 for making and possessing a destructive device; they pleaded guilty the following month. Officials said the bomb was not intended for use at the prison. Harberson reportedly drove a woman to the facility to visit a prisoner, and forgot the pipe bomb was in the car. Jenkins and Harberson were each sentenced on December 18, 2013 to around 2½ years in prison.

Nebraska: Douglas County law enforcement officers opened an investigation in early October 2013 into allegations that two unnamed former guards, one male and one female, sexually assaulted prisoners at the county jail. Both guards resigned, as did a third who had been accused earlier in 2013. Female prisoners reported that the guards would act as lookouts for one another while they sexually abused them. Douglas County Corrections Director Mark Foxall called the allegations a "personnel matter," but on October 25, 2013 the case was turned over to federal prosecutors.

New Jersey: Robert Pyott, 48, a guard employed at the Federal Correctional Institution at Fairton since 1995, was found dead of an apparent self-inflicted gunshot wound outside the perimeter fence of the facility on September 21, 2013. Bureau of Prisons spokesman Eric Williams said Pyott's body was discovered beside a vehicle shortly after 7 pm. The FBI and New Jersey State Police are investigating the incident, but no foul play is suspected.

New York: On October 6, 2013, Suffolk County District Attorney Thomas Spota announced new charges against Patrick O'Sullivan, 21, an accused rapist being held at the Riverhead Correctional Facility. While awaiting trial, O'Sullivan was accused of plotting the death of his victim by passing paper airplanes to a fellow prisoner that contained the victim's name, address, a map to her home and instructions on how to dispose of her body. The prisoner who received the notes contacted authorities and was granted an early release in exchange for helping build a case against O'Sullivan.

North Carolina: Three former guards and two former prisoners at the GEO Group-operated Rivers Correctional Institution have been sentenced for their roles in a contraband smuggling scheme. [See: PLN, Jan. 2013, p.24]. Two of the guards, Raye Lynn Holley and Rhonda Boyd, were each sentenced to 20 months in federal prison on October 3, 2013, while a third guard, Rashonda Cross, received 45 days of intermittent confinement and 3 years' probation on December 20, 2013. The two former prisoners, Roland Bazemore and Kenneth Dodd, received harsher sentences of 30 months and 37 months, respectively, for participating in the scheme, which involved smuggling cell phones and cigarettes into the facility.

Oklahoma: On September 24, 2013, eight prisoners escaped in a transport van when guards left the keys in the vehicle while they took a sick prisoner to a hospital. Six of the prisoners remained with the van when they stopped after driving about a mile, and one called 911 to report the escape. The other two, Lester Burns and Michael Coleman, ran but were quickly recaptured. The van was operated by Prisoner Transportation Services, a private firm based in Nashville, Tennessee. The company declined to comment on the incident.

Pennsylvania: Anthony Todora, a former guard at the Northampton County Prison, was one of six guards who filed suit in 2005 raising claims of toxic mold exposure at the facility. Todora and another guard filed a second lawsuit three years later, alleging they had suffered on-the-job retaliation for their initial suit, including "ridiculous nitpicking disciplinary actions." On September 20, 2013, Judge F.P. Kimberly McFadden granted summary judgment to the county in the second lawsuit. McFadden noted that Todora had a history of disciplinary problems prior to filing the original suit, and that he had shown no "matter of public concern" that would entitle him to First Amendment protections from retaliation.

Pennsylvania: Two maintenance workers at SCI-Laurel Highlands, Harold Maust and Stephen Toth, were charged with using prisoner labor to perform personal repairs and spending state funds to buy personal equipment and supplies. However, on September 23, 2013, Somerset County District Attorney Lisa Lazzari-Strasler dropped all charges against both men. Maust's attorney said he was happy the charges were dropped, while Toth's lawyer plans to file suit against state prison officials for the "totally unwarranted" charges. A prison spokesperson said an internal investigation would continue into the allegations.

Pennsylvania: Kevin William Small was incarcerated at SCI-Huntingdon when he perpetrated a tax fraud scheme that netted him an additional 135-month federal prison term to be served after completing his state sentence. In January 2012, once his state sentence had expired, Small forged a document that vacated his federal sentence. He was released and remained free for two months before being arrested. U.S. District Court Judge Gene E. K. Pratter was not amused, and on September 30, 2013, Small received a five-year prison sentence for charges related to his escape.

Rhode Island: Adult Correctional Institution guard James Petrella was arraigned on October 2, 2013 following his arrest on three counts of delivering a controlled substance. Petrella allegedly sold Oxycodone and Clonazepam to an undercover detective on three occasions in September 2013. A search of his home by Rhode Island State Police revealed four firearms and an assortment of prescription medications. Petrella's bail was set at $20,000 with surety; he failed to post bond and remained in custody.

Texas: In September 2013, McLennan County sheriff's deputies arrested Regina Antoinette Edwards and Dorothy Pennington, both guards at the privately-operated Jack Harwell Detention Center, for engaging in sexual misconduct with prisoners.

The incidents, which were discovered on recorded cell phone calls, allegedly occurred between 2011 and 2013. Pennington pleaded guilty to a charge of improper sexual activity and was sentenced to five years' probation in January 2014. A third guard, Sherry Lynn Haynes, has been charged with smuggling cigarettes into the facility, while a fourth, John Timothy Spears, was arrested in February 2014 for having a sexual relationship with a prisoner. The facility is operated by LaSalle Corrections.

Texas: Jose Rodriguez, 37, ran from the Nueces County Courthouse while being moved to the jail on September 27, 2013. He first tried to carjack a utility truck but the driver fought back. Next, while TV news crews videotaped, Rodriguez jumped behind the wheel of a police cruiser, found the keys were not in the ignition, then jumped out and headed for another police car. He locked the doors, but officers broke the windows. Rodriguez now faces a long list of charges.

Turkey: Security forces searched for eighteen members of the Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK) who escaped from a Turkish prison on September 25, 2013. The prisoners had been convicted or charged with belonging to the PKK or helping militants; they escaped by digging a 230-foot tunnel, police said. The PKK has been fighting for autonomy for the southeastern region of Turkey for three decades, and the conflict has killed more than 40,000 people.

United Kingdom: Officials at Ford Open Prison objected to some prisoners' alternative to eating meals in the dining hall or purchasing food from the canteen. Apparently the grounds of the facility were overrun by thousands of wild rabbits, and prisoners had started killing them and cooking the meat in microwaves. Prison officials announced a "bunny boiling bar" in September 2013, saying killing and eating the rabbits was causing "distress to staff members."

United Kingdom: Brixton Prison made headlines when celebrity chef Gordon Ramsey helped prisoners set up the "Bad Boys Bakery," which now provides cakes to national coffee chains. On September 23, 2013, it was announced that the prison would expand its culinary program to include a 100-seat restaurant, open to the public and fully staffed by prisoners. The Clink Charity plans to make Brixton the home of a third training restaurant in the organization's award-winning program to equip prisoners with skills to help them secure post-release employment.

left at least 16 prisoners dead, government officials reported on September 17, 2013. When armed police stormed the facility following the riot, they were surprised to find that prisoners were keeping a menagerie of exotic animals. According to La Verdad, a regional newspaper, the animals included an ocelot, raccoons, macaws and several caimans. More than a dozen farm animals were also recovered, as well as a large number of purebred dogs such as mastiffs, Siberian huskies and Yorkshire terriers.

Vermont: Windsor County State's Attorney Michael Kainen called his September 2013 plea deal with former prison guard Leanne Salls "an exercise in prosecutorial discretion." Initially charged with sexual exploitation of an inmate, Salls became pregnant and gave birth as a result of her relationship with an unidentified prisoner. "This is a single mother who has a child," said Kainen. "I wasn't comfortable making her a rapist." Salls ultimately pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor charge of prohibited acts and received a one-year deferred sentence.

Wisconsin: Former Black River Correctional Center sergeant Gregg R. Twesme, 47, pleaded guilty on September 13, 2013 to two misdemeanor counts of fourth-degree sexual assault. Twesme used his position to take sexual advantage of two male prisoners, telling one victim he would have him sent to a maximum-security facility if he reported the incident, according to the criminal complaint. Black River Superintendent Dave Andraska said Twesme was no longer employed at the prison; it was unclear whether he quit or had been fired. ■

Consequences of California's Realignment Initiative

by Christopher Petrella and Alex Friedmann

DAVID HARVEY, DISTINGUISHED PROFESSOR of Anthropology and Geography at the City University of New York, writes that "capitalism never resolves its problems; it simply rearranges them geographically." The same can be said of California's almost three-year-old Public Safety Realignment initiative – legislation designed to reduce the Golden State's prison population, in part, by transferring thousands of prisoners from state facilities to county jails.

Sadly, Realignment has merely shifted the very forms of human suffering it was originally intended to relieve. This – the paradox of modern penal reform – adds a crucial dimension to discussions about who, why and how we punish offenders. Clearly, shifting a criminal justice crisis isn't the same as solving one.

The Realignment Initiative

SINCE AT LEAST 2011, THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA has been the epicenter of contemporary prison reform in the United States. The U.S. Bureau of Justice Statistics has noted that 70% of the total decrease in state prison populations from 2010 to 2011 was a direct result of California's Public Safety Realignment initiative.

On May 23, 2011, the U.S. Supreme Court upheld an order by a three-judge federal court requiring the state to reduce its prison population to 137.5% of design capacity within two years to alleviate overcrowding that resulted in unconstitutional medical and mental health care. [See: PLN, June 2011, p.1]. California Governor Jerry Brown had called the court's order "a blunt instrument that does not recognize the imperatives of public safety, nor the challenges of incarcerating criminals, many of whom are deeply disturbed."

At the time, California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR) facilities were operating around 180% of capacity. In response to the Supreme Court's ruling, the state legislature and Governor Brown enacted two laws – AB 109 and AB 117 – designed to reduce the number of prisoners housed in state facilities. The initiative was implemented on October 1, 2011.

Realignment, as it's commonly called, was intended to decrease California's prison population by shifting "new non-violent, non-serious, and non-sexual offenders" from state prisons to county jails, while concurrently reforming the state's parole system. Under the initiative, such prisoners released from local jails are placed on county-directed post-release community supervision instead of state parole. For their part, counties receive funding from the state to help with expanded jail and probation populations under Realignment.

The Public Policy Institute of California has estimated that Realignment was directly responsible for an 11,116-prisoner drop in the CDCR's population during the first three months the initiative was in effect. To date the state's prison system has shed around 25,000 prisoners; however, this has failed to satisfy the federal courts, falling roughly 9,600 prisoners short of the target population cap. [See: PLN, Aug. 2013, p.20].

In February 2014, following several postponements, the three-judge court over the Plata v. Brown litigation – the long-standing class-action suit that led to the Supreme Court ruling and ultimately to Realignment – gave California two more years to lower the CDCR's population to 137.5% of design capacity. [See: PLN, June 2013, p.36].

While the overall downward trend in California's prison population appears auspicious at first blush, it's impossible to fully evaluate the Realignment initiative without considering the impact it has had on local jails.

As a result of Realignment, county jails now house prisoners sentenced to more than a year of incarceration – offenders who previously would have been sent to state prisons. Since the Realignment initiative was first implemented, California's jail population has predictably grown; the average daily population in local jails has increased by at least 12% – roughly equivalent to 9,000 prisoners – following Realignment.

That is, around one-third of the total state prison population reduction effectively has been shifted to county facilities. Three of the 10 largest jail systems in California have experienced increases of more than 15% in their average daily populations: Fresno (29.6%), Los Angeles (17.5%) and Riverside (18.6%). Further, as a result of Realignment, hundreds of offenders are serving lengthy sentences in jails instead of state prisons.

A February 2013 survey conducted by the California State Sheriffs' Association found that not only were 1,109 prisoners in county jails serving 5- to 10-year sentences, but 44 were serving terms of more than 10 years. San Diego County reported it had 145 prisoners serving between 5 and 10 years, while San Bernardino County said it had 105. The longest sentence reported was 43 years.

California's jail population is likely to continue to expand as prisoners with longer sentences accumulate in county jails due to Realignment. Longer sentences translate to lengthier stays, which in turn result in larger jail populations; in the short term this has generated a number of early releases due to lack of available bed space.

California has spent billions of dollars and decades in federal court due to poor conditions in its state prisons, but the problems it has been desperately trying to ameliorate are now trickling down to local governments as county jails are forced to deal with thousands of additional prisoners.

Counties Face Lawsuits

RECENTLY, CALIFORNIA-BASED LAW FIRMS advocating for prisoners' rights have sued or threatened lawsuits against a number of counties due to Realignment. The suits allege that the egregious conditions that first led to legal intervention against the state's prison system – overcrowding, poor medical and dental care, and inadequate mental health treatment – are now being repeated at the county level.

Jails that were originally designed for short-term stays are now being flooded with thousands of new prisoners, many of whom are serving longer sentences and need robust rehabilitative services that counties currently do not have the capacity to provide. Fresno, Riverside, Alameda and Monterey counties have already been sued.

In September 2013, the California State Auditor issued a warning about Realignment: "The State does not currently have access to reliable and meaningful data concerning the realignment. As a result, the impact of realignment cannot be fully evaluated at this time. Even so, initial data indicate that local jails may not have adequate capacity and services to handle the influx of inmates caused by realignment. Until enough time has passed to allow the effectiveness and efficiency of realignment to be evaluated, we will consider it a state-wide high-risk issue."

Monterey County Sheriff Scott Miller described Realignment as "a masterful stroke by Governor Brown to shift all the state's prison problems to county jails." The Monterey County jail has become so crowded that he considered buying triple-stack bunk beds to handle the deluge of prisoners. Then a nearby state prison donated extra triple bunks it had used when prison overcrowding was at its peak.

Ironically, filling CDCR facilities with such bunk beds, including in gyms and other areas not intended for housing prisoners, was one of the conditions that persuaded the three-judge federal court to order a reduction in the state's prison population.

Nick Warner, legislative director of the California State Sheriffs' Association, said counties are concerned they will be exposed to the same liabilities under Realignment that the state has spent billions of dollars trying to resolve.

"They had problems before, but realignment makes it worse because people are spending more time in jail," said Don Specter, director of the Berkeley-based Prison Law Office, which represents state prisoners in the Plata litigation.

According to the Associated Press, a lawsuit filed by the Prison Law Office against Riverside County in March 2013 claims that "medical care is so poor in its jails that some of its 4,000 inmates go months without seeing a doctor. When they do, the lawsuit contends they receive only cursory medical exams, inadequate follow-up and are rarely referred to specialists even when outside care is clearly needed."

For example, the class-action suit describes the case of a female prisoner held at the Riverside County Jail who had Stage IV colon cancer. "Nobody paid attention to her complaints that the cancer had returned," said Prison Law Office attorney Sara Norman. The lawsuit also notes that prisoners at the county's five jails "face cruel and inhumane deficits in medical and mental health care."

The suit asks the U.S. District Court to order the county "to make a laundry list of fixes, such as increased staffing, timely access to care, reliable screening and emergency-response procedures, and timely and adequate medication, supplies and mental health treatment," the Press-Enterprise reported.

The county responded by moving to dismiss the case, claiming that the prisoners who complained about inadequate health care had refused to take their medication and did not attend medical appointments. Further, the county argued that the plaintiffs "also provided inaccurate and incomplete information about their medical history and conditions" when they first arrived at the jail and during subsequent meetings with medical staff. The suit, which does not seek monetary damages, remains pending. See: Gray v. County of Riverside, U.S.D.C. (C.D. Cal.), Case No. 5:13-cv-00444-VAP-OP.

The Prison Law Office has also filed a lawsuit against Fresno County, alleging that prisoners at the county jail are routinely denied treatment for physical or mental illnesses and dental problems, and are vulnerable to attacks from other prisoners as a result of the jail's poor design and inadequate staffing. According to CBS-Sacramento, Fresno County Sheriff Margaret Mims said she could not discuss the suit due to settlement discussions. See: Hall v. County of Fresno, U.S.D.C. (C.D. Cal.), Case No. 1:11-cv-02047-LJO-BAM.

"Since Fresno has radically cut back outpatient mental health services, the jail has become a costly dumping ground for people with mental illness who need care but cannot find it elsewhere," noted Rachel Scherer, an attorney with Disability Rights California.

In November 2012, Legal Services for Prisoners with Children sued Alameda County Sheriff Gregory J. Ahern over his jail's treatment of prisoners with disabilities, with both sides blaming the increase in disabled prisoners entering the jail since Realignment. "Unfortunately, you can't just knock down a wall and make handicapped-accessible cells. It takes time," said sheriff's spokesman Sgt. J.D. Nelson. See: Legal Services for Prisoners with Children v. Ahern, Superior Court for the County of Alameda (CA), Case No. RG12656266.

The Monterey County Public Defender's Office filed a lawsuit in May 2013 to remedy substandard healthcare at the county jail that it claimed was "broken in every way." Calling the jail's medical and mental health care "woefully inadequate," the 72-page complaint includes a litany of allegations that, it says, combine with severe overcrowding to put the lives of both staff and prisoners at risk. The class-action suit alleges delays in medical treatment, deficient mental health care, inadequate suicide prevention measures, failure to provide reasonable accommodations for prisoners with disabilities and failure to protect prisoners from violence.

"It seems that our in-custody medical cases have been exacerbated due to realignment," said Monterey County Sheriff Scott Miller. "We haven't quantified it yet, but that seems to be the trend. It used to be when you were in county jail for six or eight months, you didn't need the full range of medical services."

"Monterey County has inadequate facilities and programs for inmates who use wheelchairs, are blind or have other disabilities, or are mentally ill," stated attorney Michael Bien with the San Francisco law firm of Rosen, Bien, Galvan and Grunfeld, which also represents the plaintiffs in the lawsuit. The defendants include Monterey

Although Los Angeles County – the most populous county in the state – has not yet been sued, local officials are worried that federal authorities could “soon intervene in the operation of Los Angeles County’s outdated and [overcrowded] jail system.” Consequently, the county is in the process of replacing its aging Men’s Central Jail with a new facility.

Violence Increases in Local Jails

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS REPORTED IN November 2013 that several counties had experienced a rise in prisoner violence due to increased jail populations under Realignment, based on data obtained from the ten largest county jail systems. “Some jails have seen violence dip, but the trend is toward more assaults since the law took effect on Oct. 1, 2011,” the AP stated.

The number of prisoner-on-prisoner assaults increased by 32% in the first year after Realignment compared with the previous year. Assaults on staff increased by 27%. The rise in violence outpaced the rate of growing jail populations, which rose 14% in 2012.

“You’re seeing a little more gang influence inside the jails and a little more violence,” stated San Bernardino County Sheriff John McMahon. “Certainly, the sophistication level of these inmates is different.”

This is despite the fact that more serious offenders, including those convicted of violent and sexual felony offenses, are sent to state prisons.

“The violence is just being transferred to the local facilities from the state system,” said Fresno County Assistant Sheriff Tom Gattie, whose jail experienced a 48% increase in prisoner-on-prisoner assaults in the year after Realignment went into effect.

Comparably, the CDCR reported a 15% drop in prisoner-on-prisoner assaults and a 24% reduction in prisoner-on-staff assaults following Realignment, as the overcrowded state prison population declined.

Sacramento County’s jail system had the greatest increase in assaults on staff, which rose 164% in spite of a fairly stable jail population.

In some cases, jails are unprepared for experienced prisoners serving longer sentences, including gang members. “We now have a hierarchy of inmates who have a prison culture,” stated Shasta County Sheriff Tom Bosenko.

“Jails were for 30-day stints, and the most you could do was a year. They weren’t built for people to exercise. They don’t have law libraries. They don’t have jobs,” said Don Specter with the Prison Law Office. “A lot of guys would rather go to prison just to have something to do.”

In June 2013, acknowledging that certain prisoners serving lengthy sentences did not belong in county jails, Governor Brown offered to return such offenders to the state prison system if counties would agree to take other state prisoners instead. The deal failed to go through, though, in part due to concerns that counties would send their worst, most expensive prisoners to CDCR facilities.

California Assemblyman Ken Cooley introduced legislation in February 2013

(AB 222) that would require prisoners who commit serious drug offenses – including those convicted of selling or transporting more than a kilo of cocaine, heroin or meth – to be sent to state prisons rather than local jails under Realignment.

“These county jail facilities were not set up for long-term incarceration,” he said. The bill died in January 2014.

Impact on Crime Rates

THE PUBLIC POLICY INSTITUTE OF CALIFORNIA (PPIC) reported in December 2013 that in addition to reducing the state’s prison population, Realignment may also be having an impact on crime rates.

From 2011 to 2012 – the first year after Realignment was implemented – the state’s violent crime rate increased by 3.4% while property crime rose by 7.6%. However, the report found “no evidence that realignment has had an effect on the most serious offenses, murder and rape.” Although “California’s overall increases in violent crime between 2011 and 2012 appear to be part of a broader upward trend also experienced in other states,” the study noted there was “robust evidence that realignment is related to increased property crime.”

In the latter regard, an analysis by the PPIC indicated that further reductions in the state’s prison population under Realignment could cause property crime – which includes burglary, larceny and auto theft – to increase by an additional 7 to 12%. The most significant impact was with respect to auto theft; the study estimated that due to more prisoners being released, Realignment was responsible for an additional 24,000 stolen vehicles per year.

“As realignment continues to unfold, California should consider safer, smarter, and more cost-effective approaches to corrections and crime prevention,” the report concluded.

“This is really interesting work by the PPIC,” said Matt Cate, director of the California State Association of Counties. “We’ve known for a long time that incarceration is very expensive, and for a lot of offenders it doesn’t effectively prevent criminal behavior in the long run. Under [Realignment], counties are using evidence-based programs that help individual offenders with basic housing needs, drug or alcohol treatment, and employment services. We know these programs help offenders, but often the individuals’ needs are great – especially with respect to behavioral health issues – and it takes time to develop local service capacity.”

Some critics have suggested using part of the money saved through Realignment to hire additional police officers to address increased crime rates. Of course, that would likely result in more arrests and thus more offenders returning to prison – offsetting the impact of the Realignment initiative vis-à-vis reducing the state’s prison population.

According to a December 23, 2013 press release from the CDCR, a study of all prisoners who served their full sentences and were released during the 12-month period after Realignment went into effect found slightly lower re-arrest rates and static re-conviction rates. The rate of prisoners returning to prison was significantly lower post-Realignment due to new policies for offenders who violate the conditions of their supervised release.

The CDCR noted that “prior to Realignment, more than 60,000 felon parole violators returned to state prison annually, with an average length of stay of 90 days. Beginning on October 1, 2011, most parole violations are now served in county jails. Also, offenders newly convicted of certain low-level offenses serve their time in county jail.”

A report by the Center on Juvenile and Criminal Justice, released in January 2014, concluded there was no clear connection between the state’s Realignment initiative and crime rates, as some counties experienced an increase in crime and others reported a decrease.

More Prison and Jail Beds

WHILE REALIGNMENT HAS REDUCED California’s prison population, it has not led to the closure of state prisons. Although initially slated for closure in 2012, the California Rehabilitation Center in Norco, which houses over 2,800 prisoners, remained open under a proposal announced by Governor Brown in August 2013. The proposal also involved sending more prisoners to out-of-state privately-operated facilities, as well as housing them in in-state private prisons.

"[W]orking with all the other stakeholders, I've come up with a plan that, in the short term, meets the capacity – not by letting thousands of people out but by finding additional places for incarceration, both in-state and out-of-state," Governor Brown stated.

However, Senate President Pro Tem Darrell Steinberg said the proposal was "a plan with no promise and no hope." Indeed, instead of closing prisons as other states have done in recent years, the CDCR is opening new facilities – including a 1,722-bed prison hospital in Stockton. [See: PLN, March 2013, p.56]. Further, in early January 2014, the state indicated it planned to build three medium-security housing units to hold more than 2,300 prisoners.

California officials have also contracted with Corrections Corporation of America to lease the company's 2,304-bed California City Correctional Center. Under the three-year, $28.5 million-a-year lease agreement announced in October 2013, the facility will be operated by former CCA staff who have become state employees after an abbreviated six-week training course.

"Upon completion of their training, they will have the same knowledge and skills as all newly hired CDCR correctional officers," said CDCR spokeswoman Deborah Hoffman.

The hiring arrangement was acceptable to the state's powerful prison guards' union, the California Correctional Peace Officers Association (CCPOA), because the former CCA employees will join the union, which has been losing members in recent years. The CDCR has also contracted with private prison firm GEO Group to house prisoners in-state, including at the company's McFarland Female Community Reentry Facility, Central Valley MCCF, Golden State MCCF and Desert View MCCF.

The extra bed space is needed because the state's prison population continues to grow, stated Prison Law Office director Don Specter.

"It's continuing to increase, so any building would be spending billions of dollars for only a temporary fix," he said. "It also shows that realignment was only a temporary fix, as well."

Additionally, the CDCR currently houses around 8,500 prisoners in out-of-state CCA-operated facilities in Arizona, Oklahoma and Mississippi. It was the governor's threat to move up to 4,000 more prisoners to private prisons in other states that contributed to the federal court overseeing the Plata litigation to give the CDCR two more years to meet the court-ordered prison population reduction.

"You really can't build your way out of the problem," Specter observed.

Meanwhile, counties are seeking to expand their jails to accommodate the influx of prisoners under Realignment. Since 2012, state officials have given $1.2 billion to California counties for jail construction plus $500 million to renovate or expand existing facilities, which is expected to add almost 15,000 new jail beds statewide. The Realignment initiative provides funding to counties through vehicle license fees and a portion of the state's sales tax.

"People commit crimes in the local community and they are now, to a greater degree, being supervised, being rehabilitated or being incarcerated locally. We're transferring billions of dollars to achieve that goal," Governor Brown stated. "We want the community that spawns the crime to handle the crime.”

A November 2013 Realignment Report Card by Californians United for a Responsible Budget (CURB) examined the Realignment plans of 13 “key” counties, with respect to “the balance between community-based programs that reduce imprisonment and plans to expand jail capacity or build new jail beds.”

The CURB report noted that “Shifting people from State prison to County jail is not a solution to our prison and budget crises. Realignment can most safely and effectively be implemented by using alternative sentencing and community-based services instead of expanding imprisonment and policing, both of which [are] socially and economically costly.”

However, only two of the 13 states examined in the report received a passing grade: Alameda and Santa Clara, which “have focused their resources on innovative strategies to reduce their jail population and providing programming and alternatives to incarceration.” All of the other counties intend to expand their jail capacity, including five – Kern, Riverside, San Mateo, Los Angeles and San Bernardino – that each plan to build two new jail facilities.

Those plans are not always successful, though. In December 2013, requests by Riverside and San Bernardino counties for $80 million in grants for new jail construction were denied by state officials. Riverside County already has almost 4,000 jail beds and is in the process of adding a 1,250-bed, $267 million expansion at one of its facilities, while San Bernardino County has around 6,000 jail beds.

On May 6, 2014, the Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors voted to proceed with plans to demolish the Men’s Central Jail and renovate a facility for female detainees at a cost of approximately $1.8 billion. The Men’s Central Jail currently holds around 19,000 prisoners; it will be replaced with a treatment facility for offenders with substance abuse and mental health problems. The Board authorized initial architectural plans for the new jail and an environmental impact report.

The $1.8 billion proposal to replace the Men’s Central Jail was the least costly of five plans submitted by a consultant hired by the county, Vanir Construction Management.

Still, according to Board Supervisor Zev Yaroslavy, replacing the jail is the “most expensive infrastructure project in the history of the county, without a doubt, not even close.” He objected to the proposal, stating, “I don’t believe there was a serious effort made at considering alternatives” to building a new detention facility.

The ACLU lambasted the proposal because replacing the jail would leave bed space capacity unchanged – though overcrowding would be decreased while access to care for the mentally ill and prisoners with drug or alcohol addictions would increase. Esther Lim of the ACLU criticized the Board of Supervisors for hiring Vanir, which specializes in construction projects, including jail construction, as a consultant.

“It was not surprising that a construction company in its report proposed five options, all involving construction of new buildings,” she said.

Early Releases Criticized

TECHNICALLY, PRISONERS ARE NOT RELEASED early under Realignment; rather, those that are eligible serve their sentences in county jails rather than state prisons. Governor Brown emphasized that no prisoners would be released early, and the CDCR states on its website there will be no early releases for state prisoners.

While it may be correct that offenders are not released early from state prisons, that isn’t true when it comes to former prisoners who violate the terms of their supervised release and are subsequently jailed.

As part of Realignment, most prisoners are no longer released on parole under state supervision but instead are placed on community supervision under county probation officials. When they violate their supervision they can be sent to jail for up to six months. However, due to overcrowding caused by Realignment, community supervision violators typically serve only a small amount of their jail sanction – sometimes just a few days.

According to a survey of county jails by the Board of State and Community Corrections, releases due to lack of bed space increased by 21% over the first nine months of Realignment. The most recent quarterly jail survey, from July to September 2013, reported 6,189 early releases statewide.

In February 2013, Assembly members Ken Cooley and Susan Eggman introduced a bill, AB 601, that would have required offenders who violate their community supervision to be sent to prison for up to a year. The legislation failed to pass, in part because it would have led to an increase in the number of state prisoners at a time when California is trying to further reduce its prison population to comply with the court order in the Plata litigation.

"Any attempts to change Realignment that would send more offenders to state prison must be reconciled with the federal court order to reduce prison crowding," stated CDCR spokesperson Jeffrey Callison.

High-profile crimes committed by some released prisoners have led to public outrage. For example, in June 2013, a few months after Dustin James Kinnear, 26, was released from prison and placed on community supervision under the Realignment initiative, he stabbed to death a 23-year-old woman on the Hollywood Walk of Fame because she refused to give him a dollar. Critics argued that Kinnear, who has mental health problems, would have been incarcerated at the time were it not for Realignment.

Previously, on December 2, 2012, former prisoner Ka Pasasouk, who was on community supervision under Realignment, shot and killed four people in Los Angeles.

Prosecutors are seeking the death penalty while relatives of the victims have filed suit against the Los Angeles County District Attorney's Office and Probation Department, claiming county officials had failed to properly supervise Pasasouk after he was released from prison.

"This is an experiment with people's lives," stated Michael Rushford, president of the Criminal Justice Legal Foundation, referring to Realignment.

Recent Developments

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS REPORTED IN March 2014 that some counties were undermining the Realignment initiative by increasing the number of offenders sent to state prisons due to charging decisions by local prosecutors. In fiscal year 2013-2014, 5,500 prisoners charged with and convicted of second felonies were sent to the state prison system – a 33% increase compared with the previous fiscal year.

"We're not quite sure what's behind the trend," said Aaron Edwards, with California's Legislative Analyst's Office. "When you see such a drastic increase year-over-year ... that kind of suggests that there's been some kind of behavior change at the county level, in terms of how they are charging, whether they are choosing to charge individuals as second-strikers or not."

Apparently, local prosecutors are exercising their discretion to file more serious charges against defendants, such as felonies rather than misdemeanors, in order to secure convictions that will send them to prison rather than jail under Realignment – thereby reducing the burden on county jails.

The California District Attorneys Association denied that prosecutors had altered their charging practices, but San Joaquin Public Defender Peter Fox contended there has been "some attitudinal backlash against realignment" by district attorneys and judges.

As of April 30, 2014, California's prison population was around 134,800 – 2,243 more than a year earlier. This poses a problem in terms of meeting the federal court-ordered prison population cap by February 2016.

Counties continue to seek additional money from the state for their own increasing jail populations, including funds for jail construction and expansion as well as for rehabilitative and treatment programs.

Stanislaus County Sheriff Adam Christianson noted that "if you want to see success in realignment, then the counties and local governments need help with the resources to do that."

Lobbyists representing Los Angeles County have asked state officials for assistance in funding the county's $1.8 billion overhaul of its jail system.

"We have received approximately thirty percent of the realigned population – 6,000 county jail inmates that have been sentenced under realignment,” stated lobbyist Alan Fernandes. “But we’ve received about five percent of the available funding for jail construction.”

Some lawmakers, however, have criticized the practice of pouring more money into building more jails. For example, state Senator Loni Hancock observed that the solution to California’s prison overcrowding problem is not to “replicate our prison system county jail-by-county jail.”

In May 2014, a state Senate budget subcommittee opposed a proposal to grant an additional $500 million to counties for jail construction and expansion, instead voting to provide such funds for construction projects and programs “designed to provide rehabilitative services and housing for individuals convicted of crimes.” This would potentially include treatment programs, transitional housing, and substance abuse and mental health care facilities.

“[The] vote was a small but important step in using realignment as an opportunity to find and fund real alternatives to the current disaster of mass incarceration,” said Diana Zuñiga, with Californians United for a Responsible Budget.

Meanwhile, counties will likely continue to face lawsuits and other difficulties as they grapple with the fallout of the state’s Realignment initiative and attempt to cope with their overcrowded jails – which they will have to bring into compliance with standards for holding long-term prisoners that such facilities were never designed to accommodate. Realignment and its attendant impact on local jails further corroborate the notion that correctional overcrowding is a consequence – not a cause – of California’s ongoing practice of using incarceration as a catchall solution for complex socio-economic, political and cultural challenges facing the state and its citizens. ■

Ninth Circuit Revives Prison Trust Account Seizure Claim; Disputed Ownership Requires Due Process Protections

IN AN UNPUBLISHED RULING, THE NINTH Circuit Court of Appeals reversed a federal district court’s sua sponte dismissal of a California prisoner’s claims that prison officials improperly removed money from his trust account without adequate due process protections.

California state prisoner Anthony Brazier filed a federal civil rights complaint pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983, alleging that prison officials deprived him of due process when they seized erroneously-issued tax refund checks from his prison trust account. The district court dismissed the complaint sua sponte on initial screening under 28 U.S.C. § 1915A.

On de novo review, the Ninth Circuit held that dismissal without leave to amend was improper. Citing Sanders v. City of San Diego, 93 F.3d 1423 (9th Cir. 1996), the Court of Appeals explained that “the procedural protections of the Fourteenth Amendment apply to protect a significant property interest even if there is a dispute over ownership.”

As such, the Court remanded the case

“for the sole purpose of allowing Brazier to amend his due process claim ... to allege that Brazier did, in fact, have an ownership interest in the tax refunds credited to his inmate trust account.” However, in the absence of such an allegation, “Brazier’s claim must fail.”

The appellate court upheld the dismissal of claims against the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation as barred by the Eleventh Amendment. It also affirmed the dismissal of individual capacity claims which did not allege personal involvement of individual prison officials. See: Brazier v. California Department of Correction & Rehabilitation, 523 Fed. Appx. 477 (9th Cir. 2013).

Following remand, on August 7, 2013, Brazier moved to withdraw his consent to proceed before a magistrate judge; his motion was denied in a tersely-worded order, with the court noting that he had “not shown good cause to withdraw his consent.” The case remains pending with Brazier filing a motion for summary judgment in March 2014. ■

State of Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign

Prison Phone Justice Project needs your help for statewide campaign!

While much progress has been made in reducing the costs of long distance prison calls, we are still fighting to reduce the high costs of in-state prison and jail calls at the local level. In January 2014, the Human Rights Defense Center (HRDC), the parent organization of Prison Legal News, reopened its Seattle office to launch the Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign.

This is our first statewide phone justice campaign, and we're excited to have people involved on both the local and national levels who are dedicated to ending the exorbitant phone rates and kickbacks associated with the prison phone industry. We have already been obtaining the phone rates and contracts for all 39 county jails in Washington, as well as data from the Washington Department of Corrections.

We hired a local campaign director, Carrie Wilkinson, who manages our office in Seattle and is coordinating the statewide campaign. Washington prisoners and their families pay some of the highest phone rates in the nation, and we need your help to win this battle!

Here's how you can help – first, please visit the campaign website:

There you can see all the ways you can make a difference. The site allows you to sign up for the campaign and upload videos and share blog entries about how high prison phone rates make it difficult for you to stay in touch with your incarcerated loved ones. You can even call in your story to 1-877-410-4863, toll-free, at any time! We need to hear how you and your family have been affected by high prison and jail phone rates. If you don't have Internet access, you can mail us a letter describing your experiences. Send letters to HRDC's main office at: HRDC, Attn: WA Phone Justice Campaign, P.O. Box 1151, Lake Worth, FL 33460. Washington state prisoners can send a copy of this notice to their family members so they can get involved.

By choosing to participate in the Washington Prison Phone Justice Campaign, you will be playing a key role in ending the unfair phone rates that prisoners' families have to pay. We cannot win this battle without your help, so please visit the campaign website and share your experiences! Donations are also welcome and greatly appreciated, and can be mailed to the above address or made online via the campaign website. Thank you for your support!

WHEN PRISON LEGAL NEWS FIRST started publishing in 1990, the Internet only existed for the military and a few academic institutions. PLN made its first online appearance in 1998 on what was a fairly simple website by today's standards. We have gone through several site designs and changes since then, and I am pleased to announce that on May 15, 2014 we launched three new and updated websites for www.prisonlegalnews.org, www.humanrightsdefensecenter.org and www.prisonphonejustice.org.

Our new sites, especially the PLN and Prison Phone Justice websites, are much more user friendly and utilize state-of-the-art search engine technology to make our tens of thousands of articles, court rulings, publications, back issues of PLN and other content quick and easy to find. No other website has more prison- and jail-related news and information than PLN's site, and our Prison Phone Justice site is the only one that tracks prison and jail phone contracts, rates, commission kickbacks and related data.

Best of all, most of the information on our sites is free. On PLN's website nearly all of our content, including PLN back issues, are available at no cost. The only content we charge to access is verdict and settlement information and our brief bank with almost 7,000 complaints, briefs, motions, judgments, administrative rulings, depositions, expert reports and more.

If you have Internet access, please check out our new websites; if not, let those who do know about them. PLN also maintains a social media presence on Facebook and Twitter, with around 900 likes and 2,500 followers, respectively. Further, PLN provides a free news email list. Each weekday we send out an email digest with 6-10 news stories related to prisons and jails; you can sign up on the PLN website under "subscribe." When we switched over to the new email list service we were not able to import our old subscribers, so if you were on PLN's email list previously and stopped receiving our messages, please sign up again.

In addition to being easier to use and having vastly improved search capabilities, our new websites still allow for PLN subscription purchases and renewals, book orders and donations. The Human Rights Defense Center's site contains information about HRDC's board of directors, staff, annual reports, news coverage and much more.

We always welcome suggestions and feedback on how we can make things better. We also welcome contributions to our websites – particularly verdicts and settlements where people have won cases against corrections and law enforcement agencies, and contributions to our brief bank in the form of winning briefs, motions, expert depositions, discovery requests, etc. For our publications library, we are especially interested in obtaining and posting private prison contracts and similar documents.

Our cover story this month on Realignment in California focuses attention on the dismal state of California jails, and how the absence of meaningful sentencing reform continues to be a problem as the legislative and executive branches lack the courage and political will to shorten sentences to reduce the state's prison population to constitutional levels. As more prisoners are held in California jails for longer periods of time, we are already seeing horrific jails getting even worse in terms of being unable or unwilling to provide adequate medical and mental health care. As a result, the problems resulting from overcrowding and overincarceration in California are simply being shifted and postponed, not resolved.

Enjoy this issue of PLN; please encourage others to subscribe and to check out our new and updated websites. 🐼

Florida Prisoner Awarded $1.2 Million for Burn Injuries

A FLORIDA JURY HAS AWARDED A PRISONER $1.2 million in a negligence suit against the GEO Group, the nation's second-largest for-profit prison company, following a trial that was delayed more than a year after a juror said he was afraid to reach a verdict.

The case stemmed from an August 28, 2007 argument between prisoners Roy D. Hyatt and Rodney Smith in the dayroom of their unit at the South Bay Correctional Facility. Following the spat, Smith used a microwave to boil a container of water. He then returned to the dayroom and threw the water on Hyatt, who sustained first- and second-degree burns to approximately 30% of his body and lost the use of one eye.

Hyatt sued GEO in state court, alleging the company was aware of other incidents in which prisoners had used microwaves to boil water to assault other prisoners.

Hyatt's complaint, filed by attorney Philip G. Thompson, claimed that GEO had breached its duty of care by allowing prisoners unrestricted "access to microwaves to boil water which could be used as a weapon against other inmates." The suit also alleged that it was reasonably foreseeable that the incident involving Hyatt and Smith could occur, since GEO did not remove or restrict prisoners' access to microwaves.

On May 10, 2011, shortly before the trial in the case was to begin, a juror told Palm Beach County Circuit Judge Glenn Kelley that he feared for his safety if he returned a verdict against Hyatt.

"I'm worried about reprisals against my family," the juror said. At the time, Hyatt was serving 17 years for aggravated battery with a deadly weapon and was not due to be released for another three years, but the juror stated he was afraid Hyatt's friends might hunt him down.

"This is a unique one for me," said Kelley. "I've never had a juror in the civil division express concerns about his safety."

Thompson argued that the juror's concerns were baseless. If people could get out of jury duty by claiming they were scared, he said, then havoc would reign in the justice system.

"I agree with you," Kelley replied. "If we excuse jurors based on fear of retaliation, we'd never have any criminal trials."

But when the juror said he couldn't be impartial, Judge Kelley stated he had no choice but to declare a mistrial because no alternate jurors were selected and the jury did not have enough members left to hear the case.

After the trial was rescheduled and held 16 months later, the jury found GEO Group liable for Hyatt's injuries. The panel awarded Hyatt $1,228,242, including $78,242 for future medical expenses, $150,000 for lost earning ability in the future, and $1 million for past and future "pain and suffering, disability or physical impairment, disfigurement, mental anguish, inconvenience, aggravation of a disease or physical defect, or loss of capacity for the enjoyment of life." Hyatt had offered to settle before trial for $125,000.

GEO filed a motion for a new trial, but the parties subsequently agreed to a settlement and stipulated to dismiss the case. See: Hyatt v. The GEO Group, Fifteenth Judicial Circuit Court (FL), Case No. 50-2009-CA-018316. ■

Are We Really Witnessing the End of Mass Incarceration?

by James Kilgore

"This is the beginning of the end of mass incarceration."—Natasha Frost, associate dean of Northeastern University's school of criminology and criminal justice

AFTER MORE THAN THREE DECADES OF "tough on crime," the New Jim Crow, truth in sentencing and three strikes, the law-and-order ship looks adrift with no one rushing to bring it back on course. The bubble of prison construction is about to burst, if it hasn't already. Pretty soon it may be difficult to find anyone who admits they once advocated serial prison building and trying fourteen-year-olds as adults. Crime figures are down while other distress meters rise into the danger zone – unemployment, homelessness and deteriorating public education. No longer can Directors of Corrections masquerade as first responders and lay claim to unlimited funding streams. Budgetary and social justice alarm bells are ringing loud and clear.

On top of this, as Soros Justice Fellow Tracy Huling notes, a "newfound political will" from state governors of both parties "to close prisons and, in some cases, to reduce the overall size of their incarceration systems" has emerged. At a local level, more than 40 municipalities and counties, from Kalamazoo to Jacksonville, have passed Ban the Box legislation which removes questions about criminal background from job applications. Even people with felony convictions seem to be getting a fair shake.

For those of us who have spent years of our lives in cages and for everyone who has been fighting mass incarceration, this reality is encouraging but also a little unsettling. We have perfected our mantras, honed our talking points of condemnation for everything from supermaxes to technical parole violations. Now everyone speaks like they are on our side. In a battle where the lines were once clearly drawn, the division between them and us is getting murky. After six-and-a-half years inside federal and state prisons, I'm getting pressure to call prison guards "correctional officers," being told I must find commonality with them as "exploited workers." Such urgings push me into an uncomfortable corner. Time to take a deep breath and survey the lay of the land.

The Carceral Big Picture

CAPTURING THE BIG PICTURE REQUIRES looking at several aspects of what some of us call the prison industrial complex. The first is the numbers game: do we really have less people behind bars? The answer is yes. For the past three years, the total number of people in prisons in the U.S. has fallen for the first time since 1972, a post-2009 decrease of about 43,000 out of a prison population of more than 1.5 million (2.2 million including jails). No massive celebrations are in order, however. Some disturbing new trends are creeping into the mix – like the meteoric increase in the incarceration of women in the last few years. Besides, even with the reductions, the U.S. still far outdistances the rest of the world in per capita incarceration rates and states like Pennsylvania continue to promote massive prison construction projects.

Also, the numbers game isn't everything. We need to ask what happens to people who have been taken out of prison. Do they find jobs? Are substance abuse and mental health treatment programs available? Are they managing to avoid constant harassment by police? Do they really have a future or are they destined to live at the margins, in the gutters, alleys and board-ups of U.S. cities? And most importantly, how many of them are locked up somewhere else just to keep the state prison statistics looking good?

Answering these questions is difficult. That trending catchall, "alternatives to incarceration," can become a shell game where punitive policies submerge themselves in benevolent clouds of risk assessment tools and evidence-based practices. Punishment adopts many pseudonyms.

A quick snapshot of the nation's four largest prison systems sheds considerable light on the complex dynamics involved.

New York

LET'S BEGIN WITH THE GOOD NEWS, New York, where the most significant changes have occurred. Since 1999 the prison population in New York State has decreased by 24%, with eleven prisons closed. Law enforcement officials have been quick to attribute these shifts to reduced crime produced by "hot spot" policing and "zero tolerance."

Activists Judith Greene and Marc Mauer call the decreases the result of "a remarkable change in drug enforcement policy in 1999 that entailed an unprecedented curtailing of NYPD's 'war on drugs.'" These policy changes didn't come about through a spontaneous change of heart by police, nor did legislators simply wake up to budgetary pressures. Rather, the work of advocacy groups like the NYCLU, the Correctional Association's "Drop the Rock” campaign and the Drug Policy Alliance’s Real Reform coalition exposed the bankruptcy of aggressive drug prosecutions. Eventually the public and then key officials like District Attorney Joe Hynes began to see the light.

Reforms such as the removal of mandatory minimum sentences contributed to a decline in drug arrests, from 40,361 in 2008 to 29,960 in 2012. Moreover, while the NYPD’s stop-and-frisk policy has deservedly landed New York City with a New Jim Crow label, figures from the state Division of Criminal Justice Services show that drug arrests of black defendants have actually been decreasing – from 42% of the total in 2008 to 35% in 2012. More people now receive citations for minor possession. In other cases, instead of offering penitentiary time, authorities channel thousands through treatment-based diversions like drug courts. Relaxing conditions of parole is also part of the new approach, precipitating a huge reduction in returns to prison for petty transgressions like missing a meeting with a parole officer or failing to look for work.

Still, even with all these changes, New York State’s per capita incarceration rate remains at 425 per 100,000, well below the national average of 728 but about four times that of the United Kingdom and five times the rate in Sweden. Though New York has made great strides, forgiveness and mercy have not yet been thoroughly etched into the logo of the New York State Department of Corrections and Community Supervision.

California

CALIFORNIA PRESENTS ANOTHER VERSION of the reform scenario: a set of administrative changes forced down the throat of the governor by a federal court decision. Despite its reputation as a blue state, California has been at the cutting edge of racialized mass incarceration. As recently as 2007, the state assembly voted 70-1 to pass AB 900, authorizing the construction of 53,000 new prison and jail beds. But a high-profile campaign by Californians United for a Responsible Budget (CURB), a coalition of over 50 organizations and an advocacy heir of prison abolition pioneer Critical Resistance, slowed the state’s capacity to roll out the construction.

Then, in 2009, the federal courts intervened. In a landmark move resulting from legal action by prison resident Marciano Plata, the court upheld allegations that medical care in California’s prisons was inadequate. The decision pointed to overcrowding rather than lack of services as the root problem. The court then ordered the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR) to slash the prison population from its then 200% of capacity to 137.5% within two years. Failure to comply would mean the feds would step in and run the system.

In response, Jerry Brown, first as state Attorney General and then as governor, bought time with legal appeals while he developed his plan of “realignment.” Vowing not to release people early, the governor “realigned” individuals from the state prison system by shifting them into county jails and community-based programs. AB 109, passed in 2011, was the enabling legislation that removed the cap on county jail sentences and cleared the deck for people to serve unlimited time in county lockups as long as they were “non/non/nons” – convicted of non-serious, non-violent and non-sexual crimes. Despite disturbing results like one man being sentenced to 43 years in the Los Angeles County Jail, Stanford law professor Joan Petersilia responded with typical Golden State hyperbole: “The importance of California’s realignment experiment cannot be overstated.... This is the biggest penal experiment in modern history.”

This mega- “penal experiment” came with a local sweetener: extra funds for counties to accommodate the “realigned.” Some sheriffs opportunistically used this money for jail construction rather than placing people in alternative programs. A few prosecutors developed their own pushback strategy, “upping” defendants’ charges to make sure their convictions would warrant a prison rather than jail sentence. Despite these obstructions, the plan succeeded in moving some 25,000 people out of the state system over the next two years, but fell short of the court-mandated target.

In 2011, the Supreme Court issued a final verdict: the state had to reduce its prison population to 137.5% of capacity by the end of 2013. Brown then added a second round of “bonuses” to local authorities for his pass-the-buck strategy – $315 million in extra funding to county sheriffs to accommodate their new admissions from the CDCR, with that amount to almost treble by 2015.

On the surface, Petersilia does seem to have a point – that the importance of this “cannot be overstated.” The issue is defining that importance. While Brown’s counter to the feds has bounced thousands out of state prisons, the medium- and long-term impacts remain in doubt. As more money drifts down to the county level, more sheriffs may opt to expand jail capacity rather than fund programs. If this occurs, the net result could be no significant reduction in the ranks of the incarcerated but simply more people in county jails and less people in state prisons. This would be a clear-cut loss for the men and women behind bars, since nearly any state prison, even California’s violent and racially segregated facilities where I spent a little over three years, offers programs and services vastly superior to those of most county jails.

On the other hand, if realignment were to succeed and keep reducing the number of people incarcerated in the Golden State, Governor Brown would have discovered a way of decarcerating by administrative fiat rather than via a philosophical shift or by significantly modifying draconian legislation and carceral practice.

Ultimately, the importance of Brown’s initiative may actually be in realigning the CDCR with private prison providers. While California has largely avoided private prisons, with Brown under the gun to reach the 137.5% population cap by the end of 2013 [Ed. note: the deadline has since been extended], the governor signed an agreement with Corrections Corporation of America (CCA) to lease a minimum-security facility in the Mojave Desert. While the privates generally are staunchly anti-union, the deal allegedly would staff the facility with guards from the ultra-right union, the California Correctional Peace Officers Association (CCPOA), a major backer of Brown’s campaign.

In the meantime, CURB and many other groups continue to advocate against any expansion of the CDCR’s capacity, consistently calling for the release of people with non-violent cases as a more meaningful alternative than Brown’s administrative restructuring.

California’s process demonstrates how decarceration is about far more than numbers. The recent hunger strike by men in the Security Housing Unit in Pelican Bay provides evidence that the punishment paradigm remains alive and well in California. Brown and CDCR officials’ steadfast refusal to negotiate with hunger strikers, who were demanding an end to the isolation cells in which some of them had remained for over four decades, revealed that little had been realigned in the minds of criminal justice authorities in the Golden State. Only continued pressure from below by organizations like CURB is likely to yield more permanent results.

Texas

THE UPBEAT VERSION OF RECENT CRIMINAL justice history in Texas characterizes the state as a poster child for early adoption of prison reform. The narrative goes like this: when 2007 budget projections showed Texas would need 17,000 prison beds in the next five years at a cost of $1.6 billion, a now-retired, cherry red state legislator named Jerry Madden stepped in. A series of startling reforms ensued – including the spread of drug courts, mental health and substance abuse treatment, and lower parole case loads. The resulting changes freed up some 12,000 beds in the state system, though Texas continued to carry out contracts with more than a dozen private prisons.

In policy terms, Texas – once the beacon for the “make my day” set – did soften, especially when it came to releasing people on parole. In addition, a broad-based coalition which included the ACLU of Texas, Grassroots Leadership, the Texas Criminal Justice Coalition, AFSCME Local 3807, the Texas Inmate Families Association and several other groups successfully foiled attempts at private prison expansion.

While the state managed to free up enough bed space to close several institutions, a look at the overall numbers is equivocal. Texas did register a decrease of almost 3,000 people in the state prison system from 2011 to 2012, but the numbers remain at 2005 levels of slightly over 152,000 – still the largest state prison system in the U.S. Furthermore, with an astronomical per capita incarceration rate of 923 per 100,000, Texas doesn’t amount just yet to any beacon of hope. As a recent post from the high-profile blog Grits for Breakfast asks, "If Texas justice reforms were so great, why does the state still have the nation's largest prison population?" Good question.

Where Texas has succeeded is juvenile justice. After a set of scandals involving abuse of youth in state lockups in 2007, authorities closed nine facilities and built community-based alternatives. Perhaps adult corrections officials should study their juvenile counterparts more seriously.

The Federal System

LASTLY, WE COME TO THE FEDERAL SYSTEM – the nation's key carceral growth area. Despite the recent chest-beating by Attorney General Eric Holder about setting aside mandatory minimums, the federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) has not succumbed even to the rhetoric of decarceration let alone the practice. Instead, the feds have adopted an expansion-oriented business model, partnering with private prisons to tap into the "niche market" of immigration detention, leading to an 84% rise in the number of people in immigration detention since 2005.

In addition, Congress has imposed a mandatory quota of 34,000 immigration detainees – Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) cannot let the number fall below that figure, despite declines in actual "illegal" border crossings. Coupled with harsher immigration laws like Arizona's SB 1070, this has led to a spiking of deportations, with 2012 numbers surpassing 400,000 for the first time in history. In a previous Counterpunch article, I have termed this wave of deportations "The New Operation Wetback," after an actual U.S. government program in the 1950s which repatriated hundreds of thousands to Mexico. But nowadays deportation is not the only issue.

Under the current regime, people with a prior illegal entry conviction can be sentenced to up to two years in prison before being repatriated. Those with a previous felony conviction who enter the U.S. illegally can receive up to ten years, or 20 years if it was an "aggravated felony." Locking up the undocumented has become the primary face of mass incarceration, with the feds leading the charge. This has produced a drastic change in the demographics of those who are incarcerated.

Since 2000, the number of African Americans in prison has actually fallen slightly but the ranks of Hispanics have increased by more than 50%. This has provided a lifeline for an almost moribund private corrections sector. While the privates control only 8% of the beds in the system nationwide, in the immigration detention sector they own and/or operate roughly half of the beds. Although the rate of African American incarceration remains about 50% higher than that of Hispanics, the large-scale operations of mass incarceration increasingly may be led by the troops of ICE rather than drug squads or SWAT teams.

Conclusion

IN NEW YORK, A POPULAR MOBILIZATION along with politicians waking up to fiscal realities helped precipitate important changes. In Texas and California the results have been much more uneven, with political pushback and bureaucratic manipulations like realignment stalling comprehensive shifts. While the national and state-level conversation has altered, we stand at the precipice of a very complex period – the bursting of the bubble of prison construction can assume many forms.

Tracy Huling points out some of her concerns in this regard: “I am worried that ... entrenched special interests, including unions representing prison workers and for-profit private prison companies, might somehow combine to create the perfect storm.”

Citing California Governor Brown’s dealings with private prison kingpin CCA, Huling goes on to add, “In that kind of scenario, given the extent to which campaign contributions and other kinds of bribes already corrupt the democratic process, all rational public policy considerations about the costs and benefits of prisons might be thrown out the window.”

A key point which grows from Huling’s analysis is that significantly changing the prison industrial complex entails wresting money and resources from corrections for programs, and ultimately transformative processes that attack the problem at its core. In short, there is no stopping mass incarceration without redistribution of wealth and tax revenue, without attacking poverty and inequality.

Those who have benefited from mass incarceration will find new ways to resist change, new ways to brand and deliver their commodity. In 2010, private prison operator the GEO Group bought the nation’s largest electronic monitoring firm, BI Incorporated. Clearly, GEO Group CEO George Zoley, who earned $7 million in 2010, thinks that GPS is part of the wave of the future. In a society where many people look for technological solutions to social problems, electronic home incarceration – especially as the surveillance capacity of GPS escalates – offers many attractive possibilities for investors and corrections power brokers. If prison and jail cells are rendered too costly, with home detention, families can shoulder the expense of room and board and the state can extract daily user fees for the monitoring. Most programs already impose such user fees, typically from $5 to $17 a day.

Boutique prisons constitute a second reform which can sustain or expand incarceration. Not all forms of carceral punishment come with orange jumpsuits and electrified fences. Now we have a range of product variations designed to “humanize” the captive experience: “gender-responsive” institutions (which were part of Brown’s realignment), mental health lockups (the GEO Group had also heavily invested here), and family-friendly immigration detention centers where mothers and fathers do time with their children while awaiting adjudication. And lastly, in a society predicated on dividing the rich from the poor, we have the pay-to-stay facilities where folks in Beverly Hills or Anaheim can fork out $150 a night not to have to sleep with the riffraff. All of these “alternatives” keep the resources and focus on detention and deprivation.

Ultimately, the reversal of mass incarceration necessitates not only designing genuine alternatives but transforming the dominant national mindset. Perhaps the biggest challenge to current thinking relates to notions of innocence and guilt. Often when I speak to people about decarceration or ending prison construction, they accuse me of advocating for the release of Charles Manson or backing drive-by shootings in inner-city communities. But hundreds of thousands of people behind bars fall between the “non-non-nons” and the Mansons. They should be released long before their ridiculously long sentences have expired.

These people and their families are the major victims of mass incarceration. They carry the violent label in a legal system that has been structured to punish the violence of the poor – particularly that of poor people of color. African American youth catch a violent label for possessing an unregistered gun, or get an assault on a police officer charge resulting from an aggressive stop-and-frisk. Latinos and poor whites earn the violent tag when they commit a robbery born out of the desperation of addiction or just plain old no food in the house and no access to food stamps due to a drug conviction. The bottom line dictates that if we change peoples’ social and economic realities, we can change the way they act.

I have walked prison yards with many people I would not like to see back on the streets any time soon. But I have walked with far more people who were doing life or 30 years because they got backed into a corner where doing something destructive felt like or perhaps was the only option. To reduce U.S. incarceration rates to the relatively sane levels of other industrialized countries, we have to decarcerate more than the non-non-nons. This will only come about when the social movement addressing mass incarceration grows stronger and begins to grapple with the complex racialized nexus of imprisonment, poverty, inequality and the state.

Postscript

LET ME END ON AN OPTIMISTIC BUT contradictory note. For the past eighteen months I have been involved in a campaign to stop a $20 million jail project in the county where I live – Champaign, Illinois. [See: PLN, Feb. 2014, p.44].

After lots of ups and downs, the county sheriff, who had been the chief inspiration behind the jail plans, said that he had shifted in his thinking, was no longer asking for a cent for construction, and was ready to experiment with policies that would keep people out of jail and avoid spending money on incarceration.

At the end of the meeting, after considerable discussion, he reached out to shake my hand and I accepted. I thought about washing that hand as soon as I got home but I didn’t. Still, I’m not ready to call anyone a “correctional officer” just yet. Old habits die hard and they usually hang around for a reason. 🐾

Lawsuits Challenge Conditions at Tennessee Jail; Five Charged in Bribery and Smuggling Scheme

IN THE WAKE OF A TENNESSEE FEDERAL district court hearing in a lawsuit challenging conditions at the Maury County Jail (MCJ), the number of suits filed by prisoners against the jail has nearly doubled.

At a September 2012 hearing, prisoners held at the MCJ testified they were losing weight and that the facility was overcrowded and infested with brown recluse spiders. They also claimed their requests for medical attention were often ignored.

At least 23 lawsuits concerning conditions at the MCJ have been filed. County Attorney Daniel Murphy, however, told the federal court at an October 29, 2012 hearing that the jail had made changes in response to prisoners' complaints; for example, meals were increased from 2,700 calories daily to 2,900. He also said new meal trays were provided, hygiene supplies such as toothpaste and shampoo have been increased, and old mattresses, which were worn and moldy, are being replaced.

Murphy further noted that the MCJ had formalized its grievance and medical request procedures and that 25 state prisoners had been transferred out of the facility to state prisons, to address overcrowding.

U.S. District Court Judge William Haynes commended the MCJ on taking action, but still was concerned about "the things that you can plainly see."

"[T]he bottom line here is that protecting the health of the inmates is the most important thing," he said. "You still have the steel doors on the showers that are rusted, and the vents in the showers are heavily rusted."

The federal lawsuit that was the subject of the court hearings remains pending. See: McGuire v. George, U.S.D.C. (M.D. Tenn.), Case No. 1:12-cv-00082. Columbia attorney Eugene Hallworth, who represents the plaintiff in that case, has filed at least five other suits against the Maury County Sheriff's Department.

In related news, a grand jury issued an indictment charging five people, including an MCJ guard, with bribery and drug smuggling at the jail. The indictment was the culmination of a year-long investigation by the Tennessee Bureau of Investigation, FBI and Maury County Sheriff's Department.

The investigation found that MCJ guard Derek Wayne Turner, 38, was accepting cash payments to smuggle drugs and other contraband into the facility for prisoners James E. Pierce, 40, and Benjamin R. Bradley, 35. Also charged were Melinda A. Buie, Pierce's ex-girlfriend, and Linda Chapman, Bradley's mother. They all eventually pleaded guilty.

Turner and Chapman were sentenced in July 2013 to six months' incarceration plus two years on supervised release, and time served plus one year of supervised release, respectively. Buie was sentenced to two years' probation. And in October 2013, Pierce received 13 months in prison and three years on supervised release, while Bradley was sentenced to 11 months in prison plus three years' probation. ■

Jails Face Backlash, Class-action Lawsuits Over Debit Card Fees

by Matt Clarke

THE SHERIFF OF DALLAS COUNTY, TEXAS had a good reason for giving prepaid debit cards to prisoners containing the balance of their trust fund accounts when they were released from jail.

"There was too much money handling," said Sheriff Lupe Valdez.

The cards contain the funds the prisoners had with them when they were booked into the facility, plus any money they received during their incarceration, less what they spent at the jail's commissary. But Valdez and the Dallas County Commissioners were surprised to learn that the debit cards come with fees, and that prisoners who use the cards are charged for accessing their own money.

The issue came to light when former prisoner Steve Mathis addressed the commissioners at the end of their first regular meeting in January 2013, to complain about the fees. County Judge Clay Jenkins and Commissioner John Wiley Price didn't like the idea of released prisoners having to pay debit card fees.

"But let me just tell you, it's his money," Price said, noting that was the first he'd heard about any fees. "He said he didn't give us no bank card [when he was jailed], he gave us cash. He should be able to get his money back. I got a real problem if they're being charged a fee."

Sheriff Valdez agreed, but said she didn't know much about the issue since Mathis was the first to complain about it. However, she promised to look into whether an ATM or kiosk could be placed in the jail complex so the debit cards could be redeemed with no fees.

Judge Jenkins said it would be one thing if a released prisoner could cash the card without fees by walking across the street or maybe just a few blocks away, but that is not the case.

The only places to exchange the debit cards for cash without incurring fees are two credit union locations, neither of which is within easy walking distance of the jail. A fee is charged if the cards are used at a bank not affiliated with the county's credit union; there is also a $1.50 monthly fee even if the card is not used.

The Dallas County Jail is the first in Texas to use prepaid debit cards to return funds to released prisoners, but it is not alone in facing a backlash over debit card fees.

A former prisoner at the jail in Ramsey County, Minnesota filed suit in U.S. District Court in 2013 challenging fees on the debit card he was given upon his release.

Erik Mickelson had surrendered $95 in cash when he was booked into the jail in May 2013 on a charge of violating the city's noise ordinance. But when he was released only a few hours later, he received a prepaid debit card with a $25 deduction for a mandatory booking fee plus a fee schedule that would start reducing the balance on the card within three days, according to his lawsuit. He alleged the fees included $2.75 for using an ATM, $1.50 to check the card's balance and $3.00 to transfer the money to a bank account.

"We just think that's stealing," said Mickelson's attorney, Joshua Williams. "The policy doesn't pass the sniff test."

Williams said Mickelson did not have the option of receiving a check instead of the prepaid card. "If this were a situation where someone, for whatever reason, decided that they wanted to get one of these preloaded debit cards, and they agreed to the fees, then that would be one thing," Williams noted. "But they are giving the debit cards without anyone having any meaningful say in the matter."

Ramsey County replaced paper checks with the debit cards in 2012. Responding to Mickelson's suit, the county denied most of the allegations but conceded the mandatory booking fee had been deducted from Mickelson's funds and acknowledged that the cards included usage fees. The lawsuit, which seeks class-action status, remains pending. See: Mickelson v. County of Ramsey, U.S.D.C. (D. Minn.), Case No. 0:13-cv-02911-SRN-FLN.

A lawsuit raising similar claims was filed in federal court in April 2012 by a former prisoner who had been held at a jail in Benton County, Arkansas, naming Benton County Sheriff Kelly Cradduck and Keefe Commissary Network as defendants. Keefe issues prepaid debit cards to prisoners released from the jail and collects fees on the cards, including a $1.50 weekly "maintenance" fee.

Attorneys for Keefe defended the fees when they responded to the suit. The company maintained that the "so-called 'numerous and exorbitant fees' at issue involved less than $14,000 in debit card usage fees" out of $260,000 issued to released prisoners in prepaid debit cards over a 14-month period. The lawsuit claimed that the debit card fees are "paid to Defendant Keefe in consideration of a kickback that Defendant Cradduck receives" from the company.

The parties in the class-action lawsuit reached a proposed settlement in April 2014; the class members include all people who were held at the Benton County Jail on or after April 19, 2012 who received a prepaid debit card when they were released. The county has agreed to pay $71,609.58 into a settlement fund, which includes $50,385 in attorney's fees and costs. The four named plaintiffs in the suit will receive incentive payments of $1,000 each.

The settlement has not yet been approved by the federal district court, and the case remains pending. See: Adams v. Benton County Sheriff, U.S.D.C. (W.D. Ark.), Case No. 5:13-cv-05074-PKH.

Former prisoners at the Sequoyah County Jail in Sallisaw, Oklahoma have also complained about debit card fees, but Chief Deputy Roger Fuller defended the practice, which was implemented in 2010. Fuller said the debit cards, provided by Swanson Services Corp., prevent jail employees from stealing prisoners' funds – which had happened in the past.

"It's been really helpful, especially with the responsibility of dealing with money," he observed.

Until a class-action lawsuit challenging the debit card fees is filed, that is. ■

Despite Reforms, Juvenile Offenders in Texas Remain Endangered

by Matt Clarke

TWO STUDIES BY THE LBJ SCHOOL OF Public Affairs at the University of Texas at Austin found that juveniles held in Texas jails while awaiting trial as adults are often isolated with no access to education programs, and that violence remains prevalent in state juvenile facilities in spite of recent reforms.

Texas' juvenile system, which has been renamed the Texas Juvenile Justice Department (TJJJD), was rocked by months of violence during 2012 in the agency's six secure facilities – especially the Giddings State School and Corsicana Residential Treatment Center. The spike in violence echoed widespread reports of abuse and misconduct in 2007 that resulted in substantial changes in the state's juvenile justice system.

For the first study by the LBJ School of Public Affairs (LBJ), 41 jails were asked to complete a survey related to incarcerated juveniles, their access to programs and whether they were separated from adult prisoners. The results indicated there were few prisoners under the age of 17 held in Texas jails – only 34 during the survey months of October and November 2011. The survey also showed that in 30 of the jails – roughly three-fourths – adults and juveniles were incarcerated separately. However, the report noted that juveniles might come into contact with adult prisoners during showers, recreation or meals.

“National research indicates that juveniles in adult facilities are five times more likely to be victims of sexual abuse and rape than youths who are kept in the juvenile system,” according to the report.

On May 7, 2012, two days before the LBJ report was released, Texas Attorney General Greg Abbott issued a ruling requiring jails to separate adult and juvenile prisoners.

However, even with separation there are problems. Most of the juveniles housed separately from adults are kept in long-term isolation, which may result in mental health issues and limits their access to education programs. The report noted that the lack of educational opportunities might also violate state and federal law.

“It amounts to solitary confinement for kids for anywhere from six months to a year while they await trial,” said Professor Michele Deitch, the study's lead author and an expert on jail conditions. “We're sending them back out onto the streets having deteriorated mentally” and having fallen far behind in their studies, she added.

With that in mind, Travis County Judge Jeanne Meurer has made use of a 2011 law that allows judges to order a juvenile defendant charged as an adult to be sent to a juvenile detention facility to await trial.

“My philosophy is to the extent possible kids should remain in juvenile facilities,” said Meurer. However, she acknowledged that was “not always possible” because counties need discretion when dealing with juvenile offenders who are extremely violent.

Once convicted, Texas juveniles not certified as adults are sent to the TJJJD, but their treatment at state juvenile facilities has not been much better than that experienced by youths held in adult jails.

LBJ convened a second study in 2012 after the TJJJD was rocked by high levels of violence. The crisis was so great that, in May 2012, Texas Governor Rick Perry temporarily reassigned his fix-it man, Jay Kimbrough, to the TJJJD from his post as the state's Assistant Director for Homeland Security.

Kimbrough was no stranger to the TJJJD; he had been appointed as a special master and later conservator of what was previously known as the Texas Youth Commission following a sex abuse, physical abuse and cover-up scandal in 2007. [See: PLN, March 2010, p.28; May 2009, p.24; Feb. 2008, p.1].

His task at the TJJJD was to quell the escalating violence, extortion and gang activity among juvenile offenders, particularly at the Giddings State School. Remedial measures included hiring more staff, providing incentives for good behavior and requiring employees at Giddings to wear uniforms to create a more professional environment. Kimbrough also was involved in implementing the Phoenix Program, which provides intensive counseling in a secure setting for juveniles who commit violent offenses against staff and other youths.

Professor Deitch said the second LBJ study was initiated following a request by the TJJJD's Office of Independent Ombudsman “in the wake of numerous accounts of increasing youth violence in the state-run secure juvenile facilities during 2012.” The report, titled “Understanding and Addressing Youth Violence in the Texas Juvenile Justice Department,” was released in May 2013.

Deitch said the study recognized that reforms within the TJJJD were underway, but noted “there are several findings in the report that raise particular concerns.” The report's key finding was that violence and disruptive behavior by juvenile offenders continued to increase through the end of 2012, as did non-violent major rule violations. “TJJJD appears to have a problem with managing youth behavior generally, not just a problem with violence,” Deitch wrote.

The second LBJ report also faulted the TJJJD for treating youth violence as a short-term problem rather than developing “comprehensive and proactive approaches to behavior management” to deal with the violence as a “long-term chronic issue.” Further, the report found that behavior problems differed at TJJJD facilities. The finding suggested “a lack of consistency in the way programs and procedures are implemented across the agency.”

According to the study, violence and behavior problems were the worst at the Corsicana facility, which houses mentally ill juveniles. “The Corsicana Residential Treatment Center for youth with serious mental illness has, by far, the highest levels of violent and disruptive behavior in [the TJJJD],” the report said. “This calls into question not only the safety of youth in the facility but also the effectiveness of the programming taking place there and the appropriateness of this setting for a treatment purpose.”

A report released by the TJJJD in June 2013 recommended closing Corsicana because the facility “continues to pose a risk to the vulnerable youth population it serves as hazardous debris and glass are continually unearthed after rain or strong winds.” The roughly 90 youths at the facility were using the glass and debris to harm themselves, the report stated.

Corsicana was responsible for 32% of all violent incidents in the TJJD in 2012, even though it held only 10% of the agency's secure facility population. The juveniles housed at Corsicana were removed in December 2013 at the direction of the Texas legislature.

The second LBJ study also suggested that TJJD staff had contributed to misconduct by juveniles due to the overuse of security units (i.e., segregation) as a tool to manage bad behavior. "The data suggest that the placement of youth in these punitive settings may in fact be contributing to misbehavior rather than deterring it," the report said, citing a "stunningly high number" of placements in security units. In fact, during some weeks of the study, there were "more referrals to the security units than ... youth in the facilities."

The LBJ report was not entirely negative. Researchers found that juveniles in secure TJJD facilities reported feeling safe despite the violence and misbehavior. "Most incidents do not result in serious bodily injury and do not involve weapons," the study noted, "and of particular importance given the agency's history, youth do not report sexual assault to be a significant problem."

Professor Deitch said researchers at LBJ hope the information in their report "can help guide some of TJJD's continuing reform efforts," because the conclusions provide "a number of recommendations directed to TJJD administrators and legislators."

She added, "Drawing on the advice of top experts from around the country, we recommend the development of a multi-tiered behavior management plan that incorporates preventive elements, intervention strategies, and a graduated system of discipline that includes both intensified interventions and immediate consequences."

In another report issued by TJJD Independent Ombudsman Debbie Unruh in October 2013, violence was also found to be an issue at the agency's McLennan County State Juvenile Correctional Facility – specifically, staff-on-juvenile assaults. The report detailed at least three incidents when guards in the Phoenix Program at McLennan fought with juveniles, including throwing them to the ground, holding them down and punching them in the ribs.

Some of the incidents were caught on security cameras, but in one case, the report said, a guard told a juvenile to cover the security camera before they began fighting. Several youths told investigators that the fighting was nothing more than "horseplay."

"The youth stated that the practice was for the staff and youth to trade punches in the ribs until one or the other gave up," the report stated. "Some youth claimed they did not want to participate but felt they would be made fun of if they refused."

TJJD spokesman Jim Hurley said such incidents constituted "totally unacceptable behavior.... There's no such thing as horseplay at TJJD."

Three guards were fired and four were disciplined in response to an investigation by the TJJD's Office of the Inspector General into fights involving staff at the McLennan facility. ■

Ex-football Star Exonerated a Decade after Rape Conviction

A CALIFORNIA HIGH SCHOOL FOOTBALL star who was exonerated after serving five years in prison for kidnapping and raping a classmate has fulfilled his dream of playing for the NFL, and there are now plans to make a movie about his ordeal. Meanwhile, the woman who falsely accused him has been ordered to pay $2.6 million.

The crowd in the Georgia Dome in Atlanta cheered when Brian Banks, 28, took the field wearing an Atlanta Falcons uniform in the fourth quarter of a pre-season game on August 8, 2013. The 6-foot-2, 250-pound linebacker racked up two tackles during the Falcons' 34-10 loss to the Cincinnati Bengals.

"It was definitely a good feeling," Banks said. "It was one of those things where, coming from where you're coming from, just to have people support you chasing a dream. These guys have been working on this all their life. From Pop Warner [youth football program] to high school to college, this is what they've been doing. For them to accept me, and let me be a part of it, and just get out here and play and show what I can do is more than I can ask for."

Although he was cut from the Falcons' lineup before the regular season, Banks signed a movie deal with Giddens Media, which intends to tell his story in a full-length feature film. The entertainment website TMZ reported on January 9, 2014 that the movie will portray Banks' fight to clear his name, and how he went from being a convicted sex offender to an NFL player.

Banks' saga began in 2002 while he was attending summer school at Long Beach Polytechnic High School with plans to attend the University of Southern California and play linebacker for the Trojans. His dream of college and eventually the NFL was shattered when classmate Wanetta Gibson, a sophomore, accused him of kidnapping and raping her in a school stairwell.

Banks said his attorney urged him to plead no contest to the charges and accept a plea bargain for a little more than five years in prison, followed by probation and registration as a sex offender. Banks, who was 17 at the time, said his lawyer told him he would face 41 years-to-life if he didn't accept the deal and lost at trial – despite a lack of DNA evidence in the case.

Banks took the plea bargain but never gave up his claim of innocence and continued to fight his wrongful conviction. He contacted the California Innocence Project, which is staffed with students from the California Western School of Law in San Diego, but was told his was an unwinnable "she-said, he-said" case.

"He reached out to us," said Justin Brooks, director of the California Innocence Project, "[but] there was no evidence that was going to get him out of prison."

Brooks noted that situations like the one faced by Banks are increasingly common. "Plea bargains have become the 95% solution," he told CNN.

Banks was released from prison in 2007 and placed on probation. He had to register as a sex offender, wear a GPS monitor, and stay away from schools and parks. Then, in March 2011, Wanetta Gibson contacted him on Facebook. She said she had received a large settlement from the school district years before as a result of the false rape claim. Gibson stated she wanted to "let bygones be bygones" and help Banks clear his name, but was afraid she would lose the settlement money if she told the truth.

"I will go through with helping you, but all that money they gave us, I mean, gave me, I don't want to have to pay it back, all of it, because that would take a long time," she said.

Banks contacted private investigator Freddie Parish, whose son had played football with Banks in high school, and Parish used a hidden camera to record a meeting between Banks and Gibson. It was during that meeting that Gibson recanted, acknowledging that Banks had never raped her and that she had made the whole thing up. With the videotape in hand, the Innocence Project decided it could finally get involved.

On May 24, 2012, a Long Beach Superior Court judge threw out the case against Banks after prosecutors moved to have his conviction dismissed due to the recorded conversation in which Gibson admitted he was innocent. "We do not believe Mr. Banks did the crime he pled guilty to," said Deputy District Attorney Brentford Ferreira. "Justice has been served."

Apparently, "justice" for Ferreira includes a wrongful conviction, serving five years in prison and registering as a sex offender before being exonerated due to a chance confession by the alleged victim.

"It's been a struggle. But I'm unbroken and I'm still here today," Banks, then 26, said outside the courthouse. On August 3, 2013, ten months after the judge dismissed his conviction, Banks signed on with the Atlanta Falcons.

"Talk about coming from the bottom," he told reporters after the signing ceremony. "I know all too well what that is and what it looks like and what it feels like."

Banks said he gave up hope of someday playing in the NFL when he was sentenced to prison. "I had to watch my class go on and receive scholarships and play collegiate football on a high level," he said. "For me I had to let those dreams go for me to focus on what was ahead of me, and that was five years in prison. That was a completely different life of violence and being away from your family.... Football was the last thing on my mind, and it wasn't until a few months before I was actually being released from prison that I thought about possibly trying to play football again."

Banks is currently – and appropriately – a free agent after being cut from the Falcons.

On June 14, 2013, a Los Angeles Superior Court ordered Wanetta Gibson to pay a $2.6 million judgment, including $1.5 million from her settlement with the Long Beach Polytechnic School District plus interest, attorney's fees and $1 million in punitive damages for making a false claim. ■

States Renewing Their Prison Phone Contracts

As state DOCs renew or rebid their prison phone contracts, you can help urge them to lower intrastate phone rates and eliminate commission kickbacks!

The Campaign for Prison Phone Justice needs your help in:

**** Virginia, West Virginia and Utah ******

The Departments of Corrections in the above states are in the process of re-bidding or renewing their prison phone contracts. Most DOCs receive a commission (kickback) on revenue generated from calls made by prisoners, which results in excessively high phone rates. Although the FCC voted last year to cap the costs of interstate (long distance) prison calls, which went into effect on February 11, 2014, the order does not apply to intrastate (in-state) calls. An estimated 85% of prison phone calls are in-state. This is an opportunity to ask DOCs to forgo commissions and ensure their new prison phone contracts are based on the lowest cost to those who pay for the calls – mostly prisoners' families.

Take Action NOW! Here's What YOU Can Do!

Ask your family members and friends to write, email, call and fax the DOC and the governor's office (addresses and contacts are listed below), requesting that the DOC: 1) forgo commission payments when re-bidding or renewing its prison phone contract, and 2) base the new contract on the lowest calling costs. Lower prison phone rates should apply not just to long distance calls but also to in-state calls. For a sample letter or to easily send an email, visit the Campaign for Prison Phone Justice's website and click on the "Take Action" tab:

U.S. Citizens without Remedy in Military Torture Case

by Derek Gilna

IN AN 8 TO 3 DECISION, THE EN BANC Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals reversed a ruling by Illinois U.S. District Court Judge Wayne Anderson, as well as an appellate panel that had partly affirmed that ruling, and held the judiciary should not “create a right of action for damages against soldiers who abusively interrogate or mistreat military prisoners, or fail to prevent improper detention and interrogation.”

The three appellate judges who dissented from the majority opinion argued that the plaintiffs, private American security contractors in Iraq, should have been afforded a Bivins remedy to redress their claims.

The dissent noted that both the facts and law provided an avenue by which Donald Vance and Nathan Ertel, employees of Shield Group Security (also known as National Shield Security) stationed in Iraq, could seek damages for what they contended was torture by U.S. military personnel.

According to the en banc decision, “Vance came to suspect that Shield was supplying weapons to groups opposed to the U.S.,” and became an FBI informant. However, after the individuals they had fingered accused Vance and Ertel of “gun-running,” they were arrested by American military officials in April 2006.

They were then “held in solitary confinement and denied access to counsel ... [and] interrogators used ‘threats of violence and actual violence, sleep deprivation and alteration, extremes of temperature, extremes of sound, light manipulation, threats of indefinite detention, denial of food, denial of water, denial of needed medical care, yelling, prolonged solitary confinement, incommunicado detention, falsified allegations and other psychologically-disruptive and injurious techniques.” Vance and Ertel were classified as “security internees.”

Although called before a Detainee Status Board, they were prevented from presenting evidence of their innocence and the Board did not contact the FBI to verify their claims.

“Even Saddam Hussein had more legal counsel than I ever had,” Vance told the New York Times.

The Detainee Status Board finally released both Vance and Ertel, found them innocent of the gun-running allegations and did not charge them with a crime. Ertel was released in May 2006 but Vance remained in solitary confinement until July 2006. In contravention of the Army Field Manual, Vance “was subjected to sleep deprivation, prolonged exposure to cold, intolerably loud music, ‘hooding,’ ‘walling’ (placing a person’s heels against a wall and slamming his body backward into that wall), threats of violence, and other techniques that caused physical or mental pain.”

Vance and Ertel filed suit, seeking damages from the U.S. government and then-Secretary of State Donald Rumsfeld in both his individual and official capacities. They alleged that Rumsfeld had authorized the use of harsh interrogation techniques in Iraq, and that such involvement made him susceptible to personal liability.

In response, Rumsfeld argued that “federal law does not establish an action for damages on account of abusive military interrogation, that the complaint does not plausibly allege his personal involvement in plaintiffs’ detention, and that he is entitled to qualified immunity.”

The U.S. also moved to dismiss the complaint, arguing that the “military authority exception” to the Administrative Procedure Act, U.S.C. § 701(b)(1)(6), barred the lawsuit. That section prohibits judicial review of “military authority exercised in the field in time of war in occupied territory.”

Judge Anderson rejected those arguments, denied the motions to dismiss filed by Rumsfeld and the U.S. government, and permitted discovery. An interlocutory appeal followed, and a Seventh Circuit panel reversed the district court’s decision as to the U.S. but affirmed with respect to Rumsfeld. See: Vance v. Rumsfeld, 653 F.3d 591 (7th Cir. 2011).

The en banc Court of Appeals concluded that unless a cause of action exists against “soldiers and their intermediate commanders,” none can exist against superiors such as Rumsfeld. The Court noted the historical antecedents of Bivins remedies, terming it one of only three instances where “the Supreme Court [has] created a non-statutory right of action for damages against federal employees.” It further stated that the “Supreme Court has never created or even favorably mentioned the possibility of a right of action for damages against military personnel....”

The appellate court then listed the various acts of Congress that might grant some relief to Vance and Ertel: the Detainee Treatment Act, Torture Victim Protection Act, Military Claims Act, Foreign Claims Act, Military Commission Act, War Crimes Act and the Uniform Code of Military Justice. The Seventh Circuit found that none provided for “damages against military personnel or other civilian superiors,” though they did call for compensation from the U.S. Treasury rather than the private bank accounts or assets of government or military employees.

Accordingly, the majority of the en banc Court of Appeals found that Rumsfeld could not be held personally liable because his connection to the alleged wrongdoing was too attenuated, and that Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 5662 (2009) [PLN, July 2009, p.18] held that “knowledge of subordinates’ misconduct is not enough for liability. The supervisor must want the forbidden outcome to occur.”

The dissenting judges strongly disagreed, stating that if “a victim of torture by the Syrian military can find his torturer in the United States, U.S. law provides a civil remedy against the torturer” under the Torture Victim Protection Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1350. “Under the majority’s decision, civilian U.S. citizens who are tortured or worse by our military have no such remedy. That disparity attributes to our government and to our legal system a degree of hypocrisy that is breathtaking.”

The dissent also argued that the majority decision is “not required or justified by Supreme Court precedent, and it fails to carry out the judiciary’s responsibility to protect individual rights under the Constitution, including a right so basic as not to be tortured by our government.” The majority, they said, had “in effect create[d] a new absolute immunity from Bivins liability for all members of the U.S. military.”

They further noted that 1) “Bivins is available to prisoners who have been abused or mistreated by their federal jailors ... [and] that reasoning certainly extends to the torture alleged here...”

2) a Bivins action may be brought by civilians against military personnel who violate their rights, and 3) U.S. citizens who leave the United States take their constitutional rights with them. Finally, the dissent pointed out that previous lawsuits against public officials of the U.S. government have gone forward without undue concern for the effects such litigation might have upon the accused public officials’ personal finances.

The dissenting judges concluded that the majority had missed the point of the claims at issue in the case: “The plaintiffs may or may not be able to prove their allegations – it now is unlikely they will ever have the chance to try – but they allege that the use of harsh interrogation techniques amounting to torture was the subject of Mr. Rumsfeld’s personal attention,” which “should be enough to withstand a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6).”

Vance and Ertel petitioned the U.S. Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari, which was denied on June 10, 2013 – leaving the majority en banc appellate ruling intact, and effectively holding that U.S. citizens subjected to torture by members of the U.S. military can not sue the federal government or military officials for damages. See: Vance v. Rumsfeld, 701 F.3d 193 (7th Cir. 2012), cert. denied. █

Scared Straight Programs Remain Popular Among Parents Despite Warnings

by Elly Yu

"I FEEL LIKE I'M AT MY WIT'S END," SAYS a mother about her two kids on the A&E reality TV show "Beyond Scared Straight." It's a feeling many parents relate to before sending their kids to local "scared straight" programs.

Despite evidence that scared straight-type programs are ineffective and can even be harmful in the long run, many parents continue to turn to local jails for help when it comes to behavioral issues with their children.

"The programs are popular because parents think it's a quick fix," said Lt. Terron Hayes, director of intervention at the Dougherty County Sheriff's Office in Georgia.

Dougherty County administers its own youth intervention program, which has been featured several times on the A&E show. Since its television debut, Hayes says the Sheriff's office has had an influx of calls from parents who want to sign up their kids for the program. He says he's had kids come in from other counties and even from other states across the Southeast.

Gladys Davis, of Bronwood, Georgia, said she heard about the program through her adult son. Her 14- and 15-year-old sons had been fighting with each other.

"I tried everything I could do as a parent," she said. She first tried reaching out to her local youth detention center, but was told the program there was for youth who had committed more serious offenses. After hearing about Dougherty County's program, she sent her sons to make an appointment with Hayes at the sheriff's office in February and said they haven't been back since.

"I'm just trying to get things under control so they won't get too serious," she said.

Hayes knows that the program won't get federal or state funding, and says that the jail tours are only part of his program. He says he incorporates counseling sessions with both the parents and the children, and that following-up is essential.

He says that when parents call, they are often at a weak point in their relationships with their children.

"I have parents saying, 'I can't do this anymore, you'll need to come get her, come get him - I don't want him anymore,'" Hayes said. "Because a parent has lost control, the parent is out of resources, what do they have left?"

Anthony Petrosino, senior researcher at WestEd, has done extensive research on scared straight programs and conducted meta-analysis studies looking at them. He said the message that these types of programs don't work isn't getting out to parents.

"We found that scared straight, on average, has a harmful impact," Petrosino said. "There's a disconnect between who's getting the information and who isn't."

"The other thing is TV is powerful," he said.

"Beyond Scared Straight" has had some of the highest ratings on the network and is now in its sixth season.

Petrosino says he also receives calls from parents, uncles and pastors about how to get their children into a scared straight program, despite being a researcher. The parents weren't reading his reports.

"When you do a Google search, my name comes up," he said. "I said, 'I can't in good conscience recommend scared straight for your child.'"

He says he tries to direct them to local resources, but there's a lack of awareness among parents on how to reach them.

"There's a missing gap there. They shouldn't be contacting me," Petrosino said.

The program continues to remain attractive not just for parents, but for local county jails because they're relatively cheap to run, he said. The prisoners aren't being paid for these programs and the jail tours often take groups of kids each time.

Many scared straight programs are also free, as it is in Dougherty County, which makes them appealing for parents who might not have a lot of resources.

Petrosino also mentioned in his report the "panacea phenomenon," which researcher James Finckenauer studied in scared straight programs. He said it's the public and media's "latching on for cure-alls" in something so complicated like crime.

"It's very hard to come with a cure that's going to turn them around," he said. "These are complicated problems with complicated origins."

Scared straight programs also fall in line with the "tough on crime" mentality in the justice system, said Jeffrey Butts, director of research and evaluation at the John Jay College of Criminal Justice and an expert on criminal behavior.

"It's a strong thing in America that we believe that being tough on people, punishing people, coercing them – basically forcing them to behave the way we want them to behave – it will somehow work," he said.

He says that the scared straight programs might work if the person who's trying to "scare" them is someone the young person trusts and loves.

"The basic flaw in the program is there's no relationship formed," he said.

Programs that have been proven to be ineffective, however, still continue, and scared straight programs aren't the only ones. The D.A.R.E. drug prevention initiative, for instance, continues to be taught in certain schools despite evidence it doesn't work, Butts said.

Parents turning to local law enforcement to address behavioral problems aren't uncommon, said Maj. Steven Strickland, director of field operations at the Richmond County Sheriff's Office in Georgia. Richmond County doesn't have a scared straight program, but Strickland says he'll often get calls from parents not knowing what to do with their child.

"We get a lot of folks that will bring their kids by and say kind of the same thing," Strickland said. "They'll say 'I can't make this kid do anything, you guys need to scare them.'"

But he says that law enforcement officials aren't counselors.

"We're acting out of our league sometimes," Strickland said. "If you have a kid and he's 10 years old and he's troubled, there's only so much we can do in 20 to 30 minutes."

He says if a child has chronic issues, they need to be addressed over time by professionals who aren't in law enforcement.

"Where we make our greatest impact, if there really is an issue, is getting them to the resources," he said. ■

Seventh Circuit: Atheism Considered a Religion; Survey of Prisoner Interest Required

by Mark Wilson

ON AUGUST 16, 2013, THE SEVENTH Circuit Court of Appeals held for the second time that a prisoner's request to form an atheist study group must be given the same consideration as other religious study groups.

Wisconsin prisoner James J. Kaufman, an atheist, asked to form a study group dedicated to atheism. Prison officials denied his request as one seeking to establish a nonreligious activity group. He then filed suit in federal court.

In 2005, the Seventh Circuit held that prison officials had violated Kaufman's First Amendment rights by refusing his request to create a religious study group dedicated to atheism while allowing other religious study groups. See: Kaufman v. McCaughtry, 419 F.3d 678 (7th Cir. 2005) (Kaufman I).

After Kaufman was transferred to the Stanley Correctional Institution, he "encountered nearly identical resistance to his efforts to create an atheist practice group."

Prisoners requesting to participate in religious study "fill out a Religious Preference form that allows them to select one of the recognized umbrella groups, 'no preference,' or 'other.' If the inmate selects 'other,' he may write in a religion. If the religion he specifies does not fall within one of the seven umbrella groups, he is not permitted to attend a religious practice group, though he may practice on his own by visiting the religious library or meeting with the Chaplain individually."

Atheism is not included on the form and prison officials do "not keep records of what religion inmates write in after selecting 'other' on the form." Thus, they "do not know how many inmates have selected 'other' and written 'atheist,' 'humanist,' 'secular,' 'freethinker,' or another similar term."

When Kaufman asked to start an atheism study group, the chaplain at the Stanley Correctional Institution ignored Kaufman I and "recommended denying Kaufman's atheism group because it 'is not viewed as a religious request.'" The warden adopted the chaplain's recommendation.

Kaufman then filed a second lawsuit, challenging the denial under the First Amendment and the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). He offered "evidence indicating that if an inmate writes 'atheism,' the prison does not recognize this as a religion at all, and instead lumps the prisoner in with the 'No Preference' group."

The district court "recognized that the atheist study group is a religious one," but found that prison officials had advanced a "legitimate secular reason for prohibiting an atheist group: Only two inmates (including Kaufman), it thought, have any interest in an atheist group, and it would be impractical to spend limited resources to create a study group for only two members."

The Seventh Circuit reversed, reiterating its holding in Kaufman I and finding that it could not "tell, on the record as it stands, if more inmates would have designated atheism if it had been an option on the preference form." The appellate court noted, "that is why political candidates push so hard to get their names on ballots; it is cold comfort to be told that one can run as a write-in."

Citing a 2012 survey of prison chaplains by the Pew Research Center, the Court of Appeals found "there might be at least as many prisoners interested in an atheist group as one sees in the Pagan, Eastern Religions, or Jewish groups." Ultimately, the Court concluded "that further exploration of the degree of interest that actually prevails at [the prison] is necessary before it will be possible to rule on Kaufman's claim.... Only a credible survey of the inmate population, or the simple expedient of adding 'atheist, agnostic, or humanist' to the preference form and collecting new data, can resolve this uncertainty."

The Seventh Circuit upheld the district court's dismissal of Kaufman's request for a "knowledge thought ring" as a symbol of

Amount of Drugs a Factor for Departure Sentence in Kansas Prison Contraband Conviction

by David M. Reutter

THE KANSAS SUPREME COURT REVERSED a prisoner's sentence for possession of contraband – a small amount of marijuana – after it held the sentencing court misinterpreted its statutory authority by concluding it could not consider a downward departure to the presumptive criminal sentence.

Prisoner Waddell Warren was convicted of introducing a controlled substance into a correctional facility and sentenced to an additional 122 months in prison. At sentencing, he requested a departure sentence because the amount of marijuana found in his socks was very small. The district court ruled it could not consider a lesser sentence on that basis.

Waddell appealed, and the Court of Appeals reversed in February 2012. See: Kansas v. Waddell, 47 Kan. App. 2d 57, 270 P.3d 13 (Kan. Ct. App. 2012). The Kansas Supreme Court adopted the “well-written opinion” in that case as its own.

First, it helped that the appellate court had jurisdiction to hear the appeal. At the time Warren filed his appeal, Kansas law prohibited appellate courts from reviewing “any sentence that is within the presumptive sentence for the crime.” The effect of that statutory provision was to remove claims of prejudice, corrupt motive or an error involving a constitutional right from appellate review of a presumptive sentence. Since Warren's appeal did not involve any of those issues but did involve the district court's misinterpretation of its sentencing options, the appellate court had jurisdiction to hear his appeal.

As to the merits of the case, there was “no reason that the quantity of drugs may not be taken into account as a sentencing-departure factor, just as it may be in nonprison cases involving drug possession.” Thus, “possession of only a small quantity of drugs constitutes a valid factor upon which a departure sentence may be entered on a prison-contraband sentence.” Waddell's sentence was vacated and the case remanded for resentencing “so that the district court may properly exercise the discretion given to it by statute.” See: Kansas v. Warren, 297 Kan. 881, 304 P.3d 1288 (Kan. 2013). ■

Utah Prisoner Awarded $200 for Violation of Religious Rights

A FEDERAL DISTRICT COURT AWARDED $200 to a Utah prisoner who sued on the grounds that prison officials interfered with his right to freely exercise his religion. However, the Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals dismissed part of the prisoner's appeal because he did not adequately brief some of his claims, and held that another claim was moot.

Danny Lee Warner, Jr. alleged that while he was held at the Utah State Prison, officials denied various requests that he said were necessary to practice his religion. Warner is a follower of Odinism, also known as Asatru and Odhvegr, which is a faith based on Norse mythology.

He asked for accommodations that included a metal or wood thorshammer medallion, wood runes, a wooden bowl and an altar cloth. In denying his requests, prison officials cited security concerns. Warner also alleged that for Winter Nights, an Odinist holiday period lasting several weeks, he was denied break-the-fast boxes (boxed meals to eat after sunset). Further, prison officials refused to allow him access to a publication due to a ban on all materials from the publisher, National Vanguard Press.

Warner filed suit alleging that prison officials had violated his First Amendment rights to freedom of speech and free exercise of religion, as well as his Fourteenth Amendment rights to equal protect and due process. His lawsuit also claimed violations of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) based on the denial of his request for break-the-fast boxes and the publication ban.

At the time the district court ruled on Warner's motion for summary judgment he had been transferred to the Florence Correctional Center in Arizona. Nonetheless, he proceeded on the grounds that he would be returned to Utah for incarceration at some point in the future. His lawsuit named the defendants in their official and individual capacities, and sought an injunction to prevent them from continuing to violate his rights.

The district court dismissed all but three of Warner's claims, finding that prison officials had violated the Fourteenth Amendment and RLUIPA by denying the break-the-fast boxes. The court further held that they had violated Warner's First Amendment rights and RLUIPA by banning the publication he requested.

The defendants conceded that Warner was entitled to nominal damages for the First Amendment, Fourteenth Amendment and RLUIPA violations. The court awarded $100 in nominal damages on each of the two constitutional claims, for a $200 total award.

The district court held that compensatory damages were prohibited by the Prison Litigation Reform Act because Warner had no physical injuries, and monetary damages were not available for RLUIPA violations. [See: PLN, Aug. 2011, p.22]. The court also declined to award punitive damages, as Warner did not specifically allege the defendants were motivated by an evil motive or intent, or had acted with reckless or callous indifference.

Finally, the district court found Warner was not entitled to an injunction that would have barred Utah prison officials from denying his religious rights. The court said that while it was likely Warner would be returned to the Utah Department of Corrections (UDOC) at some point in the future, "there is little reason to believe that the violations proven here are likely to be repeated." The district court noted that the publication ban was not a formal policy but rather a misinterpretation of policy which had since been corrected, and that the UDOC had said it would allow followers of Odinism to receive break-the-fast boxes during Winter Nights.

As Warner had represented himself in the lawsuit, the court did not award attorney fees; it did, however, note that he may file a motion to recover costs, and commended him for his "zealous defense of his rights and for the exemplary manner in which he has litigated his claims here." See: Warner v. Patterson, U.S.D.C. (D. Utah), Case No. 2:08-cv-00519; 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 131559 (D. Utah 2012).

Not satisfied with the district court's dismissal of most of his claims, Warner appealed to the Tenth Circuit. In an August 22, 2013 decision, the Court of Appeals said the arguments in Warner's appellate brief regarding the denial of his requests for thorshammer medallions, wood runes, a wooden bowl, other ritual items including an altar cloth and group worship were "insufficient to merit review," as they had not been adequately briefed.

The appellate court also affirmed the lower court's denial of an injunction against the UDOC and declared Warner's appeal of the RLUIPA claims moot because he was no longer incarcerated in Utah. "In deciding whether a case is moot, the crucial question is whether granting a present determination of the issues offered will have some effect in the real world," the Court of Appeals wrote. "When it becomes impossible for a court to grant effective relief, a live controversy ceases to exist, and the case becomes moot." As Warner was no longer in the UDOC's custody, "declaratory and injunctive relief therefore cannot affect defendants' treatment of him." Thus, the case was remanded to the district court to dismiss the RLUIPA claims.

Warner petitioned the U.S. Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari, which was denied on February 24, 2014. See: Warner v. Patterson, 534 Fed.Appx. 785 (10th Cir. 2013), cert. denied. ■

California's Lethal Injection Protocol Deemed Invalid by State Court

by Michael Brodheim

IN MAY 2013, A CALIFORNIA APPEALS court invalidated regulations promulgated by the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR) regarding the manner in which the state executes condemned prisoners. The appellate court held that the CDCR had "substantially failed to comply" with the procedural requirements of the state's administrative rules; the decision prohibits the state from executing any prisoner by lethal injection until it properly adopts regulations pursuant to the Administrative Procedure Act (APA).

With 745 condemned prisoners as of June 2014, California has the nation's largest death row population. In December 2006, a federal court held that the state's three-drug lethal injection protocol constituted cruel and usual punishment. Despite their best efforts, CDCR officials have been unable to execute anyone since then.

Responding to the federal court ruling, in May 2007 the state revised its execution protocol. When challenged, however, that revision was found by a state court to constitute an "underground regulation" because it had not been promulgated pursuant to the APA.

The CDCR began the process of attempting to promulgate appropriate regulations in compliance with the APA in mid-2009. [See: PLN, Nov. 2009, p.28]. That process was completed in August 2010 when the CDCR adopted regulations now codified at §§ 3349, et seq. of title 15 of the California Code of Regulations.

The same month, condemned prisoner Mitchell Carlton Sims filed a complaint seeking declaratory and injunctive relief. He argued that one of the three drugs the state planned to use for executions was unnecessary and would likely cause excruciating pain.

The trial court rejected that argument but accepted Sims' second argument – that the CDCR had substantially failed to comply with the procedural requirements of the APA when it adopted its execution protocol. In fact, the CDCR "admitted ... that it did not actually comply with many of the requirements of the APA...."

The Court of Appeal affirmed that decision, finding that the CDCR had 1) failed to articulate alternatives to the proposed three-drug execution protocol and 2) failed to explain why it rejected those alternatives, and in particular why the use of a single drug would not be as effective. See: Sims v. Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation, 216 Cal. App. 4th 1059 (Cal. App. 1st Dist. 2013).

In a book titled Chief: The Quest for Justice in California, published in November 2013, former California Supreme Court Chief Justice Ronald M. George questioned whether the death penalty was fairly implemented due to geographical disparities.

"You could have the exact same crime, let's say a straightforward street robbery homicide, result in the seeking of the death penalty in one part of the state and not in the other, among various defendants with similar past histories and records," George wrote. "This, to me, raises some troubling issues. I'm not saying I find this necessarily rises to the level of a constitutional infirmity, but it may raise policy concerns about the manner in which the death penalty is administered in California."

In February 2014, former California governors Pete Wilson, Gray Davis and George Deukmejian expressed their support for a proposed ballot initiative that would hasten executions by curtailing lengthy state court appeals in death penalty cases.

A ballot initiative to end capital punishment in California narrowly lost in 2012. [See: PLN, May 2012, p.18]. ■

Oregon Garnishment Exemption Protects Funds in Prisoners' Accounts

by Mark Wilson

A N OREGON JUDGE HAS HELD THAT A prosecutor improperly seized money from a prisoner's trust account to pay a court-ordered "compensatory fine."

In 2006, Norman Earl Schlunt was convicted of poisoning and suffocating his business partner and sentenced to life in prison. He also was ordered to pay a $20,000 "compensatory fine" to the victim's daughters, Trenna Landers and Krisanna Clark.

In August 2012, prosecutors learned that Schlunt had $1,222 in his prison trust account; they immediately garnished the entire sum for partial payment of the compensatory fine. Within days Schlunt had another $225 deposited in his account, but that money was seized, too.

Schlunt challenged both garnishments, arguing that prosecutors had improperly seized $625. Relying on a $400 personal property exemption under Oregon's garnishment law, Schlunt argued that prosecutors could not take $400 of the initial $1,222. Further, since the full amount of the second garnishment fell below the $400 threshold, Schlunt argued that the entire $225 was exempt from garnishment.

On March 1, 2013, Multnomah County Circuit Court Judge Jerome LaBarre held a hearing on the issue.

Prosecutors and attorneys for Landers and Clark argued that they were entitled to seize all of Schlunt's assets because Oregon crime victims have a right under the state constitution "to receive prompt restitution from the convicted criminal who caused the victim's loss or injury." They asserted that right trumps any statutory personal property exemptions provided by the garnishment laws. Besides, Schlunt doesn't need any money, they argued, because the prison system take cares of his basic needs.

Oregon Department of Justice (DOJ) attorneys appeared at the hearing as an unlikely ally in support of Schlunt's legal position. While they agreed that victims have a constitutional right to speedy "restitution," the DOJ attorneys noted that Schlunt was ordered to pay a compensatory fine – not restitution – as part of his sentence.

Prosecutors argued that the right to restitution encompasses compensatory fines, because "restitution and compensatory fines serve much the same purpose, both designed to pay victims for their losses."

Judge LaBarre didn't buy it. "Very simply ... words matter," he said. "The court is bound to follow the wording of the Oregon Constitution and the Oregon statutes." He therefore ordered prosecutors to reimburse $625 of the $1,447 seized from Schlunt's prison trust account. See: State of Oregon v. Schlunt, Multnomah County Circuit Court (OR), Case No. 06-03-31323.

Noting that she is a single mother with very little disposable income, Trena Landers vowed to appeal the ruling because it "bugged" her that Schlunt can buy snack foods from the prison commissary using the money in his account. "There are no Doritos and ice cream in my kitchen," she observed.

Multnomah County District Attorney Rod Underhill announced he plans to use Schlunt's case to urge legislators to change the garnishment law. Prisoners should not be able to claim the $400 exemption when the state seeks to collect restitution, compensatory fines, court fees and child support, he opined. But he also said the state shouldn't take all the money prisoners have, noting that the funds in their accounts help manage prisons because only well-behaved prisoners earn the privilege of purchasing incentive items like televisions and MP3 players. Instead, Underhill said the state should be able to take half the funds in prisoners' accounts to satisfy court-ordered financial obligations.

Until the law is changed, however, based on Judge LaBarre's ruling the $400 personal property exemption under Oregon's garnishment law applies to prisoners' trust accounts. ■

Ninth Circuit: Heck Allows § 1983 Parole Condition Challenges

by Mark Wilson

ON JULY 31, 2013, THE NINTH CIRCUIT Court of Appeals joined the Seventh Circuit in holding that the Heck doctrine does not bar all parole condition challenges brought under 42 U.S.C. § 1983.

California's Sexual Predator Punishment and Control Act of 2006 – also known as Jessica's Law or Proposition 83 – prohibits registered sex offenders from residing "within 2,000 feet of any public or private school, or park where children regularly gather." Parolees convicted of a "registerable sex offense" must also submit to GPS monitoring for the duration of their parole or sometimes for life.

In 2011, a California state court determined that the residency restriction imposed an unconstitutional "blanket" parole condition on all registered sex offenders. See: In re Taylor, 147 Cal. Rptr.3d 64 (Cal. App. 4th Dist. 2012). Blanket enforcement of the residency restriction was prohibited, but Taylor permitted a similar individualized ban.

In 2006, William Cecil Thornton was convicted of a theft charge in California and sentenced to 16 months in prison. He was released on a three-year parole term in June 2008. Due to a prior Tennessee sex offense, Thornton was required to submit to California's residency restriction and GPS monitoring as conditions of his parole.

Thornton filed suit in federal court under § 1983, challenging the residency restriction and GPS conditions; he sought damages and injunctive relief.

The district court dismissed the case for failure to state a claim pursuant to FRCP 12(b)(6). The court held that Thornton's claims were barred by Eleventh Amendment, absolute and qualified immunity, and that federal habeas corpus was his exclusive remedy under Heck v. Humphrey, 512 U.S. 477 (1994) [PLN, Sept. 1994, p.12].

The Ninth Circuit reversed, first holding that Thornton's official capacity injunctive relief claims were not barred by the Eleventh Amendment or absolute or qualified immunity.

The parole officers were entitled to absolute immunity on Thornton's damage claims for imposing unconstitutional parole conditions, the Court of Appeals held. However, qualified rather than absolute immunity extended to his damage claim that parole officers enforced the conditions in "an unconstitutionally arbitrary or discriminatory manner."

Turning to the Heck doctrine, the Ninth Circuit noted that neither it nor the Supreme Court had previously "addressed whether, or in what circumstances," parole condition challenges may be brought under § 1983.

Observing that only the Seventh Circuit had addressed the issue, the appellate court followed the reasoning of Drollinger v. Milligan, 552 F.2d 1220 (7th Cir. 1977) and Williams v. Wisconsin, 336 F.3d 576 (7th Cir.

2003) in holding "that a state parolee may challenge a condition of parole under § 1983 if his or her claim, if successful, would neither result in speedier release from parole nor imply, either directly or indirectly, the invalidity of the criminal judgments underlying that parole term." As Thornton met those conditions, the case was reversed and remanded for further proceedings. See: Thornton v. Brown, 724 F.3d 1255 (9th Cir. 2013).

The appellate ruling was amended and republished on February 18, 2014, though the outcome remained the same. See: Thornton v. Brown, 2014 U.S. App. LEXIS 3037 (9th Cir. 2014). ■

Second Circuit: RLUIPA Disallows Individual Capacity Suits

by David M. Reutter

THE SECOND CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS held in September 2013 that the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) does not create a private right of action against state officials in their individual capacities.

Anthony Washington, incarcerated at New York's Woodbourne Correctional Facility, filed suit under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 in 2009, alleging that guards Paul Gonyea, Tammi Chaboty and Keith Granger had retaliated against him for exercising his First Amendment rights to free speech and free exercise of religion. He also raised RLUIPA and due process claims.

Washington's RLUIPA claim alleged the defendants substantially burdened his free exercise rights. The defendants successfully moved to dismiss that claim because, they argued, Washington failed to plead they had placed "a substantial burden – or indeed, any burden – on his religious practice."

On appeal, the Second Circuit cited precedent holding that sovereign immunity forecloses the availability of monetary damages as a remedy against states and state actors in their official capacities under RLUIPA. See: Sossamon v. Texas, 131 S.Ct. 1651 (2011) [PLN, Aug. 2011, p.22]. Thus, he could not sustain an official capacity claim.

Washington also sued the defendants in their individual capacities. The appellate court adopted the reasoning of its "sister circuits in concluding that RLUIPA does not provide a cause of action against state officials in their individual capacities because the legislation was enacted pursuant to Congress' spending power ... which allows the imposition of conditions, such as individual liability, only on those parties actually receiving the state funds."

Individual prison employees are not "recipients" of federal funding; as such, the RLUIPA claim was properly dismissed – although the Court of Appeals declined to decide whether RLUIPA permits individual-capacity suits under the commerce clause. See: Washington v. Gonyea, 731 F.3d 143 (2d Cir. 2013).

Washington's due process claim was addressed in a separate, unpublished ruling in which the appellate court affirmed in part and reversed in part the district court's dismissal of the First Amendment retaliation claims, finding that "a liberal reading of the complaint gives rise to a plausible inference that Chaboty and Granger were involved either directly or indirectly, and Washington has therefore adequately pled a violation of his First Amendment rights on that basis." See: Washington v. Gonyea, 538 Fed. Appx. 23 (2d Cir. 2013). ■

California: Lack of Insight Cannot be Inferred when Prisoner Accepts Responsibility for Crime and Expresses Genuine Remorse

by Michael Brodheim

IN THE WAKE OF THE CALIFORNIA Supreme Court's ruling in In Re Shaputis, 53 Cal. 4th 192 (Cal. 2011) [PLN, Aug. 2012, p.16], lower courts in California continue to struggle with the issue of whether a denial of parole predicated on "lack of insight" is supported, in any given case, by the requisite "some evidence" of the prisoner's current dangerousness.

In April 2013, the Court of Appeal, First Appellate District reiterated its previously stated view that "an inmate's lack of insight into the causes of his criminal conduct cannot rationally be inferred from his inability to remember the conduct where ... he acknowledges his factual, legal and moral responsibility for the criminal act, and has expressed genuine remorse."

The appellate court characterized the view of the parole board that "an inmate unable to recollect commission of his offense cannot understand the factors that caused him to commit it" as, variously, "irrational," "purely speculative" and "guesswork."

The issue arose in the case of James Charles Stonerod, a Native American who, in 1986, while extremely intoxicated, murdered the 17-year-old son of his long-time girlfriend and also tried to kill her. Convicted of second-degree murder, Stonerod was sentenced to a term of 15 years to life, consecutive to an 11-year term for attempted murder and weapons enhancements. Believing he deserved to be punished, he did not appeal his convictions.

Stonerod became eligible for parole in 2002. He was denied parole at that time, and again in 2006. The parole board told him to 1) stay discipline free; 2) get self-help; 3) earn reports of positive behavior, known as "chronos"; 4) learn a trade; 5) get therapy; and 6) obtain a GED. Another parole hearing was scheduled for 2010.

Stonerod complied with all of the parole board's requirements except for getting his GED – a deficiency which the board ignored at the 2010 hearing. But his substantial compliance was of little use, as the parole board instead fixated, for the first time, on his inability to fully recall committing his offense.

Noting that Stonerod had a history of alcoholic blackouts and that nothing in the record called into question the authenticity of either his lack of recall or his remorse, the court rejected the parole board's unsupported theory effectively equating lack of recall with "lack of insight."

The appellate court summarized its lengthy decision by stating, "A factually indefinable deficiency in perception and understanding that involves a significant aspect of an inmate's criminal conduct, and has some rational tendency to show he poses an unreasonable risk of danger, may show an inmate unsuitable for parole. But it is not enough to establish that the insight is deficient in some specific way; there must additionally be some connection between the deficiency relied upon and the conclusion of current dangerousness."

The Court of Appeal, with one judge dissenting, found that "The requisite connection is not present in this case. [Stonerod's] inability to recall commission of the ... offense does not, ipso facto, indicate he constitutes a threat to public safety."

Accordingly, the case was remanded to the parole board for a new hearing. See: In re Stonerod, 215 Cal. App. 4th 596, 155 Cal. Rptr. 3d 639 (Cal. App. 1st Dist. 2013), review denied. ■

Washington Appellate Court Addresses Right to Public Hearings in Civil Cases

by Mark Wilson

ON SEPTEMBER 19, 2013, THE COURT of Appeals of Washington held that the state constitution creates a right of public access to the courts shared by civil litigants and the general public. It also held, however, that a litigant waives his right by failing to assert it and lacks standing to assert the right on behalf of the general public.

When Rolando Reyes was incarcerated for burglary in 2004, a Washington Assistant Attorney General (AAG) petitioned to commit him to the Special Commitment Center (SCC) to await trial as a sexually violent predator (SVP). While at the SCC, Reyes was twice convicted of custodial assault with sexual motivation. The SVP petition was dismissed when Reyes was sentenced to another 36 months in prison for the custodial assaults.

In 2008, the AAG re-filed the civil commitment petition and Reyes moved to dismiss. The AAG appeared telephonically and "the judge, two attorneys representing Mr. Reyes ... and a court reporter were present in chambers for the motion hearing."

The court denied the motion and a bench trial was held nine days later. The judge found that Reyes "was a sexually violent predator and ordered him committed to the SCC."

On appeal, Reyes challenged the sufficiency of the evidence presented at the bench trial and argued that "the 'closure' of the courtroom at the pretrial hearing on his motion to dismiss" violated article I, § 10 of the Washington Constitution, which requires that "justice in all cases shall be administered openly."

In the latter regard, after an extensive analysis of the text and history of § 10, the Court of Appeals concluded "that the requirement that justice be openly administered includes, at a minimum, the long recognized right of the public to attend court proceedings. The provision is not expressed as an individual right, but as a command to the judiciary ... § 10 creates a right held by all Washingtonians."

Further, "When a dispositive motion is argued to the court in a civil case, it should be heard in the courtroom or other facility open to the public," the appellate court wrote. "Any waiver of the public forum will have to take place in the courtroom in accordance with" factors set forth in Seattle Times Co. v. Ishikawa, 97 Wn.2d 30, 640 P.2d 716 (Wash. 1982).

Although Reyes' motion to dismiss should not have been heard in chambers, the Court of Appeals found that he had waived his $ 10 public hearing argument by failing to assert it at the time. The Court added that a "litigant who fails to assert the right to a public hearing must show how he was prejudiced by the closure" of the courtroom to the public.

Discerning "no valid interest in allowing a litigant to assert a right for others that he declined to assert for himself," the appellate court also concluded that Reyes lacked standing to argue a $ 10 violation on behalf of the general public. The lower court's order was therefore affirmed. See: In re Reyes, 176 Wn. App. 821, 315 P.3d 532 (Wash. Ct. App. 2013). ▀

Arkansas Jail Prisoner Can Proceed on Failure to Protect Claim Against Guard

by David M. Reutter

THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS has upheld the denial of summary judgment to a guard who was aware of a threat of harm to a pretrial detainee, but reversed as to a jail supervisor because the only evidence against him was inadmissible hearsay evidence.

Arkansas pretrial detainee Chariell Ali Glaze filed a civil rights action against jail guard Demontrel L. Childs and Lt. Gary Andrews for failing to protect him at the Faulkner County Detention Center.

Glaze was removed from his cell on March 5, 2010 to be transferred to administrative segregation for reasons that are unclear in the record. After he was moved, fellow detainee Bradley Boyce told Childs, "if you bring [Glaze] back in here, there are certain inmates in here talking about hurting him." According to Glaze, Childs said he would "talk to the lieutenant and see what can be done."

Later, Childs told Boyce that he "talked to the lieutenant and the lieutenant said he couldn't do anything about it." Boyce testified that "knowing that they have done moves like that before and moved people around on those grounds, either [Childs] is lying or he didn't give the lieutenant all of the information." That evening, after Glaze was returned to his cell, he was attacked by three other prisoners. He required six stitches when treated for his injuries at a hospital, and subsequently filed suit.

The district court denied summary judgment motions filed by Childs and Andrews, who then appealed.

The Eighth Circuit held the denial of summary judgment to Childs was appropriate, because his comment about speaking to a supervisor about the matter indicated he appreciated the danger to Glaze. The appellate court rejected Childs' argument that Boyce's failure to identify the would-be assailants allowed him to escape liability.

A jury could find that Childs failed to inform the lieutenant of the danger to Glaze because he did not want to bother the lieutenant or didn't care what happened to Glaze. "The evidence at this stage does not foreclose either possibility," the Court of Appeals wrote.

However, the only evidence against Lt.

Andrews consisted of statements that Boyce claimed Childs had made. The Eighth Circuit held those statements were inadmissible hearsay, and absent any evidence that Andrews was actually aware of a danger to Glaze, he was entitled to summary judgment.

The district court's order was therefore affirmed in part and reversed in part to enter judgment in favor of Andrews. This case remains pending on remand. See: Glaze v. Byrd, 721 F.3d 528 (8th Cir. 2013). ▀

5.85 Million People Disenfranchised in Supposedly Democratic America

by David M. Reutter

THE UNITED STATES IS BILLED AS THE world's largest and greatest democracy. However, it is also "one of the world's strictest nations when it comes to denying the right to vote to citizens convicted of crimes," according to The Sentencing Project, a Washington, D.C.-based non-profit that promotes sentencing reforms, advocates for alternatives to incarceration and criticizes racial disparities in our criminal justice system.

The Sentencing Project reports that 5.85 million Americans are unable to vote due to state felon disenfranchisement laws.

Only Maine and Vermont have no disenfranchisement statutes, allowing even prisoners to vote while incarcerated. Prisoners cannot vote in the other 48 states, while 31 states deny voting rights to probationers and 35 disenfranchise parolees. Jail detainees who have not been convicted of a felony can still vote in most cases.

Twelve states have the most extreme sanctions and deny voting rights to some or all ex-felons who have successfully completed their prison, parole or probation terms. Those states include Alabama, Arizona, Delaware, Florida, Iowa, Kentucky, Mississippi, Nebraska, Nevada, Tennessee, Virginia and Wyoming.

While most states have a process for former felons to regain their right to vote, it can be onerous and in some cases expensive. In Tennessee, for example, ex-felons must pay all restitution and court costs owed plus be current on any child support payments before they are allowed to vote.

Public opinion research has shown that a majority of Americans favor probationers and parolees, as well as those who have completed their sentences, regaining their voting rights. Yet The Sentencing Project has reported a dramatic increase in the rate of disenfranchisement since 1980.

"At that time, far more of the nation had disenfranchisement rates below .5% and no state disenfranchised more than 5% of its adult citizens.... disenfranchisement rates in 2010 varied from less than .5% in Massachusetts, New Hampshire, North Dakota, and Utah (and zero in Maine and Vermont) to more than 7% in Alabama, Florida, Kentucky, Mississippi, Tennessee and Virginia."

Although it has the third largest prison system in the nation, Florida tops the list for disenfranchisement. With over 1.5 million people prohibited from voting, Florida disenfranchises 10.42% of its population. By contrast, Texas and California, which have the largest state prison systems, only disenfranchise 2.91% and 1% of their citizens, respectively.

The rate of disenfranchisement varies "tremendously" across racial and ethnic groups, according to The Sentencing Project. This is problematic for Hispanics but has been devastating for African-Americans. In 1980, Arizona and Iowa disenfranchised 10% of their African American populations and several southern states exceeded 5%. By 2014, Florida, Kentucky and Virginia disenfranchised 20% or more of black adults. Overall, around 7.6% of black adults are disenfranchised nationwide – or one in every 13.

This is not surprising, as many states' disenfranchisement laws were enacted in the post-Reconstruction period following the Civil War, as a way to deny voting rights to freed slaves. In some cases, such laws were specifically designed to disenfranchise blacks who were thought to be more likely to commit certain crimes. "While it is debatable whether felony disenfranchisement laws today are intended to reduce the political clout of communities of color, this is their undeniable effect," The Sentencing Project noted.

The number of people who are disenfranchised has steadily grown in recent years. This contrasts with a decline between 1960 and 1976 as states expanded voting rights during the civil rights era. Many states have scaled back their disenfranchisement laws since the 1970s.

For example, Maryland and Washington eliminated disenfranchisement after prisoners had completed their sentences or terms of community supervision. Rhode Island now only restricts the voting rights of prisoners as opposed to all felons including those on probation and parole. Nebraska instituted automatic restoration of voting rights after a two-year waiting period following completion of a prison sentence.

However, as the prison population in the U.S. grew exponentially in the 1980s and 1990s, there was a corresponding increase in the number of people who lost their voting rights.

The scope, eligibility and reporting practices of states' methods for restoring the voting rights of disenfranchised felons vary greatly. The Sentencing Project made a "rough estimate" of states' re-enfranchisement rates, finding felons and former felons had their rights restored "from less than 1% of all ex-felons in all states to over 16% in Delaware."

Of the people who are disenfranchised, 25% are in prison or jail. "The remaining 75% are living in their communities, having fully completed their sentences or remaining supervised while on probation or parole." This means that "over 4 million of the adults who live, work, and pay taxes in their communities are banned from voting."

That is enough votes to change the outcome of state, local and national elections. The Sentencing Project noted that "one study found that disenfranchisement policies likely affected the results of seven U.S. Senate races from 1970 to 1998 as well as the hotly contested 2000 Bush-Gore presidential election."

"Denying the right to vote to an entire class of citizens is deeply problematic to a democratic society and counterproductive to effective reentry," The Sentencing Project concluded.

Other democracies do not impose unilateral restrictions on the voting rights of citizens who commit crimes. In 2005, the European Court of Human Rights held "that a blanket ban on voting from prison violates the European Convention on Human Rights, which guarantees the right to free and fair elections." Similarly, courts in South Africa, Israel and Canada have ruled against restrictions on voting rights solely due to criminal convictions.

Not so in the United States, the land of the not-so-free with liberty, justice and voting rights for some but not all. ■

European Court of Human Rights Ruling Rebukes U.S. Prison System

by Derek Gilna

ASUSPECTED TERRORIST DIAGNOSED as mentally ill will not be extradited from Britain to the United States to face charges that he conspired to establish a terrorist training camp in the U.S., a European court has ruled.

The Grand Chamber of the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) denied the extradition of Haroon Rashid Aswat from the United Kingdom to the United States on the grounds that his mental and physical health would face “significant deterioration” in the “more hostile” U.S. prison system.

The ECHR’s initial decision was issued on April 16, 2013; a subsequent ruling, reported in September 2013, resulted from a request by the U.K. for the Grand Chamber to reconsider the case. The decision means Aswat will remain in Britain indefinitely. See: Aswat v. United Kingdom, ECHR Case No. 17299/12.

The Court’s ruling was widely viewed as a rebuke of the U.S. justice system’s severity of punishment and the treatment prisoners receive at “supermax” facilities.

Aswat was indicted for his alleged involvement with radical Islamic cleric and suspected terrorist Abu Hamza in a plot to establish a jihadist training camp in Oregon. British authorities detained him in 2005 after U.S. officials requested his extradition. Hamza, who is partially blind and has parts of both hands amputated, was extradited in 2012 to face trial in the U.S.

Under normal circumstances, Aswat also would have been transferred to the United States. Instead, in 2007 he challenged his extradition on the basis of his diagnosis and treatment for paranoid schizophrenia at a high-security psychiatric hospital west of London.

The ECHR found that, “In light of the medical evidence before it, ... there was a real risk that Mr. Aswat’s extradition to the USA, a country to which he had no ties, and to a different, potentially more hostile prison environment, would result in a significant deterioration in his mental and physical health.”

The Court noted that “such deterioration would be capable of amounting to treatment in breach of Article 3” of the European Convention on Human Rights, which prohibits “inhuman or degrading treatment.”

Representatives from the U.S. Department of Justice had told the ECHR that they could not say for certain how long Aswat would be incarcerated pending trial, nor where he would be held.

The Court said that if extradited, Aswat “could remain in pre-trial detention for a number of years and there was no information as to the conditions of that detention; and that it was likely that if convicted in the USA he would be detained in ADX Florence (a ‘supermax’ prison), where he could be placed alone in a cell and the conditions of isolation were likely to exacerbate his mental illness.”

The ECHR added it had given “full consideration to the submissions of the U.S. Department of Justice made in the proceedings before the Court, and observed, in particular, that it could not be determined with certainty in which detention facility or facilities Mr. Aswat would be placed if extradited to the USA, either before or after trial. It was also unclear how long he might expect to remain on remand pending trial.”

The ECHR’s ruling marks a rare instance where extradition to the United States was denied on grounds other than the possibility that a defendant might face the death penalty.

Meanwhile, Abu Hamza, Aswat’s co-defendant, went to trial on federal terrorism charges. He was found guilty in May 2014 and will be sentenced in September. ■

Bureau of Prisons Mistakenly Served Meat Intended as Pet Food

by Derek Gilna

ATEXAS MEAT MANUFACTURER HAS pledged to adopt new procedures to ensure compliance with food safety laws and paid almost $400,000 to resolve a U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA) investigation into mislabeled meat that was intended for pet food but instead was sold to the federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) and served to prisoners.

The U.S. Department of Justice was quick to point out in an August 17, 2012 press release that there was “no evidence that anyone who consumed any of the ... product suffered any ill effects.”

According to the Justice Department, John Soules Foods, Inc. of Tyler, Texas entered into a settlement agreement with the U.S. Attorney’s Office for the Eastern District of Texas and the USDA Food Safety and Inspection Service.

“This settlement agreement upholds the government’s commitment to food safety while also recognizing that John Soules Foods, Inc. is a good corporate citizen with a long record of regulatory compliance and customer satisfaction,” said U.S. Attorney John Bales.

Under the agreement, the company will pay $392,000 to the federal government to resolve the USDA’s three-year investigation, and in return John Soules Foods will not be subject to criminal, civil or administrative action. The firm also agreed to adopt new procedures to ensure that it follows the Federal Meat Inspection Act and Poultry Products Inspection Act, and will conduct a review of its existing procedures, records and policies to ensure continuing compliance.

John Soules Foods did not admit civil or criminal wrongdoing and “has cooperated and has demonstrated a desire to continue to cooperate in investigating any allegations that any of their products may have been received in an adulterated state or without the appropriate labeling,” the settlement stated.

The company’s website says it is the leading fajita meat processing company in the United States; it makes meat products for food service distributors, chain restaurants and supermarkets.

The federal investigation was initiated following allegations that in late 2006 and early 2007, John Soules Foods altered or mislabeled a raw product known as "beef trimmings" before selling it to some wholesale buyers, according to the Justice Department.

USDA investigators found evidence that the company "experienced problems getting some of their beef trimmings product to freeze properly." As a result, John Soules Foods sold the product to an independent meat broker who agreed to resell it as pet food.

John Soules Foods did not change the labeling on the boxes to indicate that it was intended as pet food, with the understanding that the beef trimmings would be sold for that purpose. But investigators said the independent broker "violated the agreement and sold the boxes of pet food beef trimmings to another meat broker for human consumption."

Some of the beef trimmings were then resold to the Bureau of Prisons and served to prisoners, the Justice Department stated.

Although the BOP claims that its food meets all federal standards, prisoners have long suspected otherwise. Periodic complaints arise about meals causing prisoners to become sick, such as a 2011 outbreak of salmonella that occurred at USP Caanan in Pennsylvania that led to hundreds of lawsuits. [See: PLN, Dec. 2013, p.38].

According to a November 7, 2013 news report, the BOP paid over $700,000 to settle 446 of 513 lawsuits filed by prisoners related to salmonella poisoning at USP Caanan. The outbreak, caused by chicken that had not been properly refrigerated, resulted in prisoners experiencing headaches, diarrhea, abdominal pain, nausea, vomiting and chills.

In 2011 and 2012, some BOP facilities attempted to use meat trimmings packed into plastic sleeves even though prisoners complained about the smell and taste; the quality of the meat was so poor that it could not be formed into meatloaf or hamburgers.

That followed incidents in 2010 in some BOP prisons where cubed turkey was passed off as chicken. Prisoners complained that the meat's rubbery texture and taste made it unpalatable. It was eventually discontinued after prisoners filed complaints noting that the item was not on the BOP's national menu.

Following the incident involving the John Soules Foods beef trimmings intended for use as pet food, there was no indication whether the BOP will revise its purchasing policies to ensure that food served to prisoners meets minimum standards of quality. ■

DOJ Intervenes in Class-action Suit Challenging New Orleans Jail Conditions; Consent Judgment Entered

by David M. Reutter

THE U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE (DOJ) intervened in a class-action lawsuit that alleged “abusive and unconstitutional conditions of confinement” at the Orleans Parish Prison (OPP) in New Orleans, Louisiana. The lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court by the Southern Poverty Law Center (SPLC), resulted in a consent judgment approved by the court in June 2013.

The DOJ’s intervention in the case came three years after the Department issued a findings letter that concluded numerous conditions and practices at the OPP violated prisoners’ constitutional rights. The DOJ’s September 2009 letter found prisoners were not protected against harm from excessive use of force by staff and prisoner-on-prisoner violence due to inadequate supervision; that prisoners did not receive sufficient medical and mental health care, including proper suicide prevention; that inadequate fire safety precautions placed prisoners at serious risk; and that the jail’s physical structure caused an unreasonable risk of serious harm to prisoners’ health and safety. [See: PLN, March 2010, p.30].

However, the DOJ did not take further action until three weeks after the class-action suit was filed by the SPLC. In an April 23, 2012 letter to the City of New Orleans, DOJ officials said deficiencies at the OPP required “emergency action.”

“The depth and breadth of horror stories coming out of that jail are really consistent, which is troubling,” stated SPLC managing attorney Katie Schwartzmann. The DOJ’s motion to intervene “further confirms the gross neglect, sadistic rapes, and brutal beatings that have become so commonplace at Orleans Parish Prison. We hope the sheriff will stand up and finally address the abusive and inhumane conditions that have plagued the jail for far too long.”

A major contributor to violence at the OPP is the understaffing of “densely populated housing pods” and inadequate classification of prisoners, the lawsuit claimed. The sheriff’s office “has failed to take minimum reasonable measures to protect prisoners from harm and is deliberately indifferent to the obvious and substantial risk of harm to prisoners caused by OPP staff and other prisoners.”

According to the SPLC, documents from the sheriff’s office indicate that in July 2011, guards beat a prisoner in the jail’s temporary tents and tried to cover it up. Further, three prisoners were stabbed by other prisoners, including one who died.

In addition to rampant violence at the OPP, the class-action suit cited a lack of adequate mental health care, general unsanitary conditions, poor food and insufficient assistance for Hispanic prisoners who do not speak English.

There is a complete lack of safeguards for suicidal prisoners, the complaint alleged. The main job of one OPP psychiatrist was “writing prescriptions and occasionally providing reactive crisis care.” Finally, the sick call process at the jail was inadequate and failed to properly treat prisoners’ medical needs.

In April 2013, the district court released videos taken by prisoners using contraband cell phones inside the OPP’s now-closed House of Detention, which showed them using drugs, gambling, drinking beer and displaying a loaded gun at the jail. One video even showed a prisoner who had apparently escaped and was walking down Bourbon Street, an area known for bars and strip clubs. The release of the videos resulted in a firestorm of criticism against Orleans Parish Sheriff Marlin N. Gusman; the videos, which were four years old, reportedly had been locked in a safe at the sheriff’s office and not previously disclosed.

“It is now clearer than ever that the Orleans Parish Sheriff’s Office is not keeping the prison secure and our city safe,” said New Orleans Mayor Mitch Landrieu.

The DOJ informed the district court that both parties had agreed to its motion to intervene in the class-action suit because that would be the most efficient way to resolve the case “with a single, comprehensive remedy.”

On June 6, 2013, the court approved a consent judgment between the DOJ, the plaintiff class and the sheriff’s office. The 53-page judgment addressed issues ranging from use of force policies, procedures, training and reporting to staffing, mental health care and suicide prevention, medical care, sanitation and environmental conditions, fire safety, juvenile prisoners held at the jail, and compliance and monitoring. The consent judgment will remain in effect until the defendants achieve substantial compliance with its terms and have maintained substantial compliance for two years.

According to the Orleans Parish Prison Reform Coalition, however, “The consent decree has not resulted in significant improvement in the conditions in the jail, and the first report of the federal monitoring team found that inmates in OPP ‘continue to experience severe problems with shoddy medical care, violence and a general attitude of apathy toward their grievances.’”

Indeed, there have been ongoing problems at the OPP following the approval of the consent judgment. On March 23, 2014, a prisoner died following a fight with another prisoner at the jail’s temporary tent housing unit. The prisoner, Willie Lee, 40, reportedly died due to heart failure.

Further, OPP guard Lateefa Marshall, 32, was fired and named a fugitive in May 2014 after being charged with assaulting a female prisoner at the jail. Marshall, who faces a felony charge of malfeasance in office, is accused of starting a fight with the prisoner and then filing a false report concerning the incident.

“It basically amounted to simple battery,” said Sheriff Gusman. “She was seen striking the [prisoner] several times but there were no other weapons involved. But this was a type of conduct that should not have occurred. We don’t tolerate that conduct.”

In October 2013, the parties to the class-action suit agreed to settle the amount of attorneys’ fees in the case, with the Orleans Parish Sheriff’s Office agreeing to pay $900,000 to the SPLC in 60 monthly installments of $15,000 each, beginning on January 15, 2014. See: Jones v. Gusman, U.S.D.C. (E.D. La.), Case No. 2:12-cv-00859-LMA-ALC.

The sheriff’s office subsequently entered into a partial settlement agreement with the City of New Orleans, which it had named in a third-party complaint in the SPLC’s class-action suit, in April 2014. The agreement addresses funding to hire additional jail staff in fiscal year 2014, which will help the sheriff’s office comply with the terms of the consent judgment.

Most prisoners held at the OPP will be moved to a new $145 million, 1,438-bed facility, the Intake & Processing Center, which is scheduled to open soon. The provisions of the consent judgment apply to the new facility.

In May 2014, the New Orleans City Council released details about a new plan for the parish's jail system, which includes a smaller jail population, minimizing new jail construction and housing prisoners with mental health needs at the Intake & Processing Center.

Sheriff Gusman did not attend the event, stating it "would not be beneficial" due to unresolved issues between the city and the sheriff's office. Gusman wants to renovate another 285-bed jail facility, known as Templeman V, and use it to house high-security prisoners.

The city's jail system plan would cost around $6 million while Sheriff Gusman's proposal would cost an estimated $10 million.

D.C. Circuit Reinstates Prisoner's FOIA Suit

by Derek Gilna

CARLOS MARINO, INCARCERATED FOR a 1997 drug conspiracy conviction, submitted a Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) request to the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA), seeking the agency's investigative file for a co-conspirator who had testified against him at trial. The DEA denied his request and an administrative appeal, and Marino filed suit in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia.

He argued that most of the information sought in his FOIA request was in the "public domain" because it was disclosed during his trial, and that "the public interest in revealing the government misconduct he alleged outweighed the personal privacy interests the DEA had interposed."

The DEA moved to dismiss, relying on FOIA Exemption 7(C) – which "allows an agency to withhold 'information compiled for law enforcement purposes' if disclosure 'could reasonably be expected to constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy.'" Marino failed to respond and the district court granted summary judgment to the DEA.

Marino then filed a motion for reconsideration and a motion under Rule 60(b) for relief from judgment, citing a "grossly negligent" effort on the part of his attorney as an excuse for his failure to timely respond to the DEA's motion.

Fed.R.Civ.P. 60(c)(1) allows a court to grant relief for failure to timely file if a party can show they have "a meritorious claim or defense to the motion upon which the district court dismissed the complaint." Marino's motions were denied and he appealed.

The D.C. Circuit reversed, finding that Marino had cleared the "meritorious defense" hurdle by showing that "vacating the judgment will not be an empty exercise or a futile gesture."

The appellate court then addressed the public domain issue, triggered when "the prior disclosure establishes the existence (or not) of records responsive to the FOIA request." The DEA objected that "Marino's theory of the case is no defense because public information showing the existence of an investigatory file ... does not vitiate its right under FOIA exemption 7(C) to withhold the contents of that file."

The Court of Appeals disagreed, finding that the public domain exception provided Marino "with a meritorious defense to the DEA's summary judgment motion," and remanded the case for the district court to consider the merits of Marino's Rule 60(b) motion to vacate the summary judgment order. See: Marino v. DEA, 685 F.3d 1076 (D.C. Cir. 2012).

Following remand, Marino was released from prison then died before his claims were decided, and in December 2013 the district court designated a surviving family member, Griselle Marino, as a substitute plaintiff.

On February 19, 2014, the court denied the DEA's renewed motion for summary judgment, writing that "The purpose of FOIA is to 'pierce the veil of administrative secrecy and to open agency action to the light of public scrutiny.'" The district court held the DEA was not entitled to summary judgment under Exemption 7(C), and that Marino had "demonstrated a significant public interest" in the requested documents, which showed the co-conspirator who testified against him at trial – Jose Everth Lopez – had committed perjury, and that a federal prosecutor had withheld evidence.

Marino's cross-motion for summary judgment also was denied, and the case remains pending before the district court. See: Marino v. DEA, U.S.D.C. (D. D.C.), Case No. 1:06-01255-GK; 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 20191. ■

Florida Guards Sentenced in Bribery Scheme

THREE FORMER FLORIDA PRISON GUARDS, including a security chief, were sentenced to probation and ordered to perform community service after entering guilty or no contest pleas to charges that they accepted bribes to perform favors for prisoners, including supplying contraband, providing special treatment and "protection." The charges stemmed from events that occurred at the Calhoun Correctional Institution (CCI) in Blountstown, Florida, where the guards worked.

Colonel John "Sammy" McAlpin, 43, pleaded guilty in Calhoun County Court to multiple charges of misdemeanor petit theft and was sentenced in October 2013 to one year of probation and 150 hours of community service. He also forfeited his corrections certification.

Former prison guard Stephen Whit Pickron, 34, pleaded no contest and was sentenced on May 15, 2013 to 104 days in jail, 10 years' probation and 250 hours of community service. The court dismissed Pickron's jail sentence on November 18, 2013 in response to a motion to modify his sentence.

Former guard Nicholas Anson Hansford, 24, also pleaded no contest and was sentenced on May 15, 2013 to 104 days in jail, 10 years of probation and community service. Like Pickron, Hansford filed a motion to modify and the court subsequently removed his jail term.

Pickron, Hansford and McAlpin – the former Chief of Security at CCI – were all arrested in September 2012 and charged with unlawful compensation for official behavior. McAlpin was further charged with official misconduct.

According to an affidavit filed by the Florida Department of Corrections (FDOC), the trio's bribery scheme was discovered in November 2010 after the husband of a guard found 40 letters written to his wife by a prisoner at CCI. The letters detailed a relationship between the prisoner and the woman, and in one letter the prisoner "indicated he was paying for protection and that 'Big Daddy' looked out for him," the affidavit stated. Investigators said "Big Daddy" was a nickname given to McAlpin.

The prisoner wrote that he had paid $500 for protection and the use of a cell phone. The letters also implicated other FDOC guards who were involved in illicit activities.

The guard's husband turned over copies of the letters to a sergeant at CCI, who gave them to Col. McAlpin, who then convened an investigation. The female guard involved in a relationship with the prisoner who wrote the letters was fired, and the prisoner was placed in segregation while the investigation remained pending. McAlpin reported that he put the letters in the warden's office for safekeeping before giving them to Law Enforcement Inspector Mike Harrison with the FDOC's Office of Inspector General.

When Harrison interviewed the former guard's husband in January 2011, however, it was learned that some of the letters were missing. The FDOC affidavit stated the woman's husband then provided a complete set of copies of the letters to investigators, and Harrison discovered the missing letters referenced money paid to McAlpin and other guards.

The prisoner who wrote the letters said in a sworn statement on December 21, 2011 that he had given McAlpin $2,400. The prisoner told authorities that McAlpin offered protection to prisoners at CCI and notified them of unannounced contraband searches, and estimated that McAlpin had received more than $20,000 in Western Union money orders over the preceding year from prisoners' friends and relatives.

Separately, a former prisoner told authorities that between May 24 and June 4, 2010, he met with Pickron and gave the guard $400 in cash and eight Western Union money orders totaling $2,750 that were sent to him from families of CCI prisoners. Pickron later admitted he had accepted the cash and said he turned it over to McAlpin.

Pickron also picked up a $400 money order on November 12, 2010 that came from a prisoner's girlfriend. The next day, the prisoner told his girlfriend in a recorded phone conversation that the payment was for a job change at CCI.

Six days later, Pickron received a $1,500 money order from a prisoner's sister. A phone call recorded the prisoner telling his sister the money was to make things "better for him." The same woman sent Pickron $300 on December 9, 2010; the prisoner later admitted the money was in exchange for alcoholic beverages and information from the Internet. The prisoner's sister sent another $700 within the next six weeks. "There's been some big changing around here," the prisoner told her in a phone call. "I can't explain it, but everything is so perfect now."

When investigators questioned Pickron on September 19, 2012, he said he kept only a small portion of the money each time and gave the rest to McAlpin. He stated McAlpin had originally approached him, saying, "You know, there is money to be made.... You can make money off these inmates like this." For his participation in the bribery scheme, Pickron received a post change that gave him weekends and holidays off.

The investigation also revealed that Hansford was involved in the scheme. He deposited $300 worth of money orders into his personal bank account in October 2010. Using the alias "Stan Smith," he also received money orders totaling $1,455 from prisoners in exchange for smuggling contraband into CCI between March 7 and June 7, 2012.

Notably, none of the three guards involved in the bribery scheme was required to serve jail time despite their egregious misconduct. ■

CCA Guard Killed During Riot was on Prisoners' "Hit List"

by Matt Clarke

A FEDERAL LAWSUIT FILED BY THE family of a guard murdered during a riot at a Mississippi facility claims that prison officials knew the guard was on a "hit list" compiled by prisoners when he was called in to help quell the disturbance.

Catlin Hugh Carithers, 24, was beaten to death during a May 20, 2012 riot at the Adams County Correctional Center near Natchez. The facility is operated by the Nashville, Tennessee-based Corrections Corporation of America (CCA), the nation's largest for-profit prison company. The 2,567-bed Adams County facility houses low-security adult male immigrants for the federal Bureau of Prisons, most of whom face deportation after finishing their prison sentences.

Adams County Sheriff Chuck Mayfield initially told reporters that the disturbance involved a power struggle between two different factions of prisoners, but an affidavit filed in federal court by an FBI agent in August 2012 stated the riot was a protest by prisoners against poor food, inadequate medical care and alleged mistreatment by staff at the facility.

In addition to Carithers' death, half a dozen guards were held hostage and others were trapped for hours inside the prison. Twenty people, including both prisoners and employees, suffered injuries; investigators said the riot involved up to 300 prisoners and caused an estimated $1.3 million in property damage.

Numerous prisoners were charged with participating in the disturbance. Nine pleaded guilty on March 11, 2014 to one count each of rioting in a federal correctional facility, according to a press release issued by the U.S. Attorney's Office. Nine other prisoners had previously been charged in connection with the riot and four were convicted.

The lawsuit filed by Carithers' family claims that "the facility was short staffed and underequipped, and the inadequate staffing and treatment of the inmates created dangerous working conditions for correction officers working there." Further,

CCA "created a dangerous atmosphere for the correction officers by depriving the inmates of basic needs and treating them inhumanely."

The suit also alleges that two days before the riot, a CCA security official was alerted by an informant at the facility that prisoners planned to stage the protest and that Carithers was one of several guards on a "hit list."

The next day, according to the lawsuit, "the inmate informant again informed the facility security officer that the situation was more serious than first thought. Again, the inmate warned that certain correction officers were on a 'black list' and any officer that disrespected an inmate would be punished." The informant was communicating with the security official via text and email using a contraband cell phone, which the informant was allowed to possess.

The CCA security official, identified by the informant as John Vanik, allegedly knew that Carithers was on a "hit list" when Carithers was called into work after the riot broke out – on his day off – and knew that prisoners "intended on injuring, or punishing" the guards on the list. An email from Vanik stated he had passed the informant's warnings on to the warden.

The hours-long disturbance at the Adams County prison began at 2:40 p.m. and centered on the inner compound and housing units. Prisoners were seen armed with makeshift weapons, including broom handles and trash can lids. They also built a bonfire in the prison yard but none tried to escape. Sheriff Mayfield said the facility's Special Operations Response Team (SORT) and guards from other CCA-run prisons in the area responded to the disturbance, along with sheriff's deputies and the Mississippi Highway Patrol.

On the day of the riot, one prisoner told a local news channel that the CCA guards "always beat us and hit us. We just pay them back.... We're trying to get better food, medical [care], programs, clothes, and we're trying to get some respect from the officers and lieutenants."

The Jackson Free Press reported receiving an email from a prisoner the day after the disturbance, stating: "The guard that died yesterday was a sad tragedy, but the situation is simple: If you treat a human as an animal for over two years, the response will be as an animal."

PLN managing editor Alex Friedmann said the informant at Adams County contacted him following the riot. Friedmann, who also serves as president of the Private Corrections Institute (PCI), a non-profit watchdog group opposed to prison privatization, said that according to the informant, the day before the disturbance the warden met with two prisoners whom he believed were leaders among prisoner factions at the facility.

What the warden did not realize, however, was that the two "leaders" no longer had any influence over the other prisoners, as they had been removed from their leadership positions prior to the riot. "CCA didn't know and these guys didn't say they'd been forced out by the other inmates. They weren't aware these guys had no say anymore and no power to control the guys in their groups," Friedmann explained.

"The next day the inmates begin congregating on the yard," he continued. "The [guards] who were there at the time took a strong, hard response, and they threw tear gas from the roof to break up the congregation, and [the prisoners] climbed up on the roof and assaulted the guards throwing tear gas at them." Carithers was one of the guards on the roof.

Friedmann also blasted CCA board chairman John D. Ferguson for refusing to honor Carithers at the company's annual shareholder meeting on May 16, 2013. Friedmann, who served six years in a CCA-operated prison in the 1990s, called for a 30-second moment of silence for Carithers near the end of the meeting.

"CCA holds a shareholder meeting just once a year, and they couldn't give 30 seconds to honor the memory of one of their own who died in the line of duty," Friedmann said in a PCI press release. "That is callous and insensitive. It is also indicative of the value that CCA places on its employees. This is the one time, at the annual meeting, that shareholders could collectively recognize Mr. Carithers."

Friedmann said he became a shareholder in order to keep a watchful eye on

CCA. "I own a small amount of stock which allows me to attend the company's annual meetings and introduce shareholder resolutions," he stated.

The riot and its aftermath caught the attention of federal lawmakers. "There are some issues with the privately run facilities, so I think between the Bureau of Prisons and the Department of Homeland Security, you will see some restricting of that process," said U.S. Rep. Bennie G. Thompson, a Mississippi congressman and the ranking Democrat on the House Committee on Homeland Security.

The lawsuit filed by the Carithers family remains pending; CCA filed a motion to dismiss, which was denied on March 17, 2014. See: Carithers v. CCA, U.S.D.C. (S.D. Miss.), Case No. 5:13-cv-00066-DCB-MTP.

CCA is not the only for-profit prison company that has experienced problems in Mississippi. Private prison firm GEO Group lost contracts to operate three facilities in the state, including the Walnut Grove Youth Correctional Facility, which was the subject of a federal lawsuit that exposed extremely brutal and violent conditions, including rampant sexual abuse of juvenile offenders. ## Cook County Detainee's Suit Alleging Deliberate Indifference to Safety Survives Summary Judgment

by David M. Reutter

THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT COURT OF Appeals has reversed a district court's grant of summary judgment to a jail guard accused of being deliberately indifferent to a prisoner's safety.

The case involved an incident that occurred at the Cook County Jail in Chicago, Illinois. The plaintiff, pretrial detainee Uvion Junior, was housed in a maximum-security tier at the facility with 19 two-man cells. To minimize "detainee incidents," no more than 20 of the 38 prisoners on the tier were allowed to use the dayroom area at the same time.

When guard Summer Anderson came on shift one day, she noticed two cells were not properly locked. She wrote "security risk" in her log but took no further action. At around 6:30 p.m. that evening she released half the prisoners on the tier for their scheduled dayroom time. Some prisoners asked Anderson to let the other half out, too. Shortly afterward the other cells were opened and Anderson then left her post for up to 20 minutes.

The detainees released from the second set of cells did not enter the dayroom; rather, they congregated in a darkened corridor between the two rows of cells on the tier. Needing to use the restroom, Junior entered the corridor to return to his cell. He was attacked from behind by several prisoners armed with shanks, suffered multiple stab wounds and ran to Anderson's guard station for help, but she wasn't there. He was hospitalized for two days.

The Seventh Circuit held the district court had prematurely dismissed Junior's suit. It was fear of violence that had motivated the rule forbidding more than 20 prisoners to mingle in the dayroom area, and the risk of violence was further amplified by the sole guard leaving her post. The dark corridor made the situation more dangerous by allowing the prisoners who attacked Junior to hide. Those facts could allow a jury to find Anderson was deliberately indifferent to prisoner safety, resulting in Junior's injuries.

The Court of Appeals also noted this case raised claims that "cry out for evidence that a lawyer could obtain but the [pro se] plaintiff could not." As there was no basis to assume that Junior's claims lacked merit, the district court's grant of summary judgment to Anderson was reversed and the court was ordered to try to recruit counsel for Junior on remand. The case currently remains pending. See: Junior v. Anderson, 724 F.3d 812 (7th Cir. 2013).

Prison Officials Praise Industry Programs Despite Downsides

by David M. Reutter

AS THE U.S. ECONOMY REMAINS SLUGGISH and companies consider layoffs to cut costs, the outlook for prison industry programs is mixed, with some reporting increased revenue and others reporting net losses.

Prison industries are big business according to a 2012 report by the Louisiana Legislative Fiscal Office, which examined industry programs in 15 Southern states.

The report found the programs employed 23,838 prisoners and generated $473.8 million in sales with $1.6 million in net profit in fiscal year 2012. What states did with those proceeds varied; some reinvested profits into their industry programs while others used the funds for other purposes.

State prison industry programs, however, are dwarfed by UNICOR, the trade name for Federal Prison Industries. UNICOR employs around 13,000 federal prisoners at factories in 62 facilities, and reported gross revenue of $609.7 million in fiscal year 2013 – but a net loss of $4.2 million. UNICOR has been laying off workers and closing some of its factories over the past several years. [See: PLN, Nov. 2013, p.52].

Prison officials are quick to tout the advantages of their industry programs.

“The benefits of TCI [Texas Correctional Industries] are twofold,” said spokesman Jason Clark. “From a fiscal perspective, TCI benefits the state of Texas by generating cost savings.... From a rehabilitative perspective, TCI places offenders in realistic work environments and enables them to obtain marketable job skills.”

TCI produces over $70 million in products each year, including engraved mugs, furniture, lockers, fencing, janitorial supplies, apparel, Texas flags and awards, and other items. Most prisoners who work for TCI are not paid.

In March 2014, the California Prison Industry Authority began offering a Computer-Aided Design program for women prisoners at the Green Valley Training Center, in which they will use CAD software “to improve existing correctional industry product designs and to develop new products,” according to The Folsom Telegraph.

“This program ensures offenders have the job skills they need to stay on a positive path toward employment when they are released,” said Jeffrey A. Beard, secretary of California’s prison system and chairman of the Prison Industry Board.

Tennessee’s prison industry program, TRICOR, reported saving taxpayers $3.3 million in “supervision and programming costs” in 2012. It also transferred $194,000 into a criminal injuries compensation fund for victims that year.

The 2013 annual report for North Carolina Correction Enterprises indicated it had $90.3 million in sales that fiscal year, with a $2.5 million net loss. Among other items, the prison industry program produces highway signs, janitorial supplies, furniture, paint and eyeglasses.

Louisiana’s Prison Enterprises, which operates a garment factory and other programs, reported a $1.27 million net profit in fiscal year 2012 on gross revenue of $17.9 million. All profits go back into the program to repair equipment, cover utilities and staff salaries, and pay prisoner wages – which range up to $.20 per hour.

Many state prison industries also operate PIE (Prison Industry Enhancement) programs, which allow free-world businesses to use prisoner labor to produce goods and services sold on the open market. [See: PLN, March 2010, p.1]. The National Correctional Industries Association reported that 4,618 prisoners were employed in PIE programs nationwide as of December 31, 2013. Prisoners who work in PIE programs typically earn minimum wage, but there are deductions for victim restitution, room and board, family support and taxes. In 2013, PIE program workers earned a total of $41.45 million with $24.92 million (or around 60%) in deductions.

Most prison industries cite the rehabilitative benefits of their programs, in terms of providing prisoners with job skills and work experience.

“While it operates as a business, the real output is inmates who are trained in marketable skills so that they can return to the community as productive members of society,” UNICOR’s senior deputy assistant director, Philip J. Sibal, told a Congressional committee in June 2012.

But one of the downsides of prison industry programs is that they use low-cost prisoner labor that sometimes unfairly competes with free-world businesses.

For example, hundreds of jobs at clothing factories in Alabama, Kentucky and Tennessee, and at a helmet-manufacturing company in Pennsylvania, were lost or put at risk due to competition from UNICOR. [See: PLN, March 2014, p.52; Feb. 2013, p.42; July 2009, p.21].

American Power Source, an Alabama company, announced in September 2012 that it planned to close two plants after losing a contract to make exercise clothing for the U.S. Air Force. The contract went to UNICOR. The plants ultimately remained open, but 50 of the company’s employees, who made at least $9.25 per hour, lost their jobs to federal prisoners who will earn up to $1.15 an hour in a UNICOR program.

American Power Source employee Misti Keeton empathized with the prisoners, as she used to be incarcerated herself. Yet she has a family to feed and said she feared losing her job.

“I’m terrified,” she stated. “I’ve got two teenagers at home. I don’t know what I’m supposed to say to them if I lose this job. I don’t know what I’m supposed to feed them.”

“The government doesn’t want me to be on welfare,” Keeton continued. “They don’t want me to be a repeat offender. So why are they going to give my job to someone who is not going to come to this plant when they get out of prison?”

She raises a good point – a point that indicates the rehabilitative benefits of prison industry programs may be illusory in terms of providing prisoners with job skills they can use to obtain post-release employment.

Cathy Griffiths, operations manager at American Power Source, noted that the garment industry mostly employs women.

“[T]his has always been a working mother’s job – we work 7 to 3 and the wages, though not always the best, they’re good, decent wages,” she said. “Of the company’s 261 employees, fewer than 10 are men. Sewing is not something men do for a living in the United States.”

However, as of January 2014, almost all of UNICOR's 22 clothing and textile factories were located in facilities that house male prisoners – which raises questions as to whether the skills they are learning will actually help them obtain jobs after they're released, or if they are primarily being used as low-paid labor to generate revenue for prison industry programs. ■

Ohio Community Corrections Program Hires Former Prisoners to Work at Supermax

THE CLOSURE OF A MINIMUM-SECURITY facility in Ohio created temporary jobs for prisoners who are being released, through a pilot program to help integrate them into society while saving the state money. The catch? The former prisoners work at a prison.

When Ohio officials closed a 240-bed minimum-security satellite facility on the grounds of the Ohio State Penitentiary (OSP) in the fall of 2012, it left a void. Prisoners at the satellite facility had prepared the meals for about 500 prisoners at OSP, the state's highest security prison, which keeps prisoners confined to their cells 23 hours a day.

The Community Corrections Association, a non-profit organization that runs a halfway house transition program, obtained a contract to fill that void.

Fourteen of Community Corrections' clients, who are either on probation or in a post-prison transition program, are shuttled by van to work two shifts of food service at OSP. Starting at 4:30 a.m. each day, the Community Corrections workers prepare meals for OSP prisoners; guards then deliver the meals to the prisoners' cells.

Community Corrections also entered into a contract to perform janitorial services at OSP. That arrangement, which began in September 2012, provides jobs for three Community Corrections clients. None of the jobs, either janitorial or in food service, entail the workers having direct contact with OSP prisoners.

"It gives you a chance to get back on your feet," said Christopher Guy, a janitor at OSP employed in the Community Corrections program. "It gives us a chance to prove to the community that we have what it takes to re-enter society and be trusted doing it."

OSP Warden David Bobby, who previously worked at Community Corrections, developed the pilot program. "Sixty days after they're done with supervision from [Community Corrections], we want them to go and find another position somewhere else," he said. "Even while they're here, my expectation is that they continue to pursue other employment."

On average, participants in the Community Corrections program will work at OSP for six months. "The goal is that these guys come here, get some work experience, earn some money, and go and be productive members of society," Bobby stated. "We ask the community to hire these ex-offenders, so to do our share, I think it's only prudent that we do the same thing."

Those employed in the Community Corrections program at OSP are classified as temporary workers and make $12 to $14 per hour, with 25% of their earnings withheld to cover costs. They keep the remainder of their pay.

"When they leave us, they're walking out the door with thousands of dollars in their pockets to either set up independent living or to go back to family and loved ones," said Community Corrections chief operations officer Jeremy Simpson.

When not working at OSP, the Community Corrections clients participate in substance abuse treatment, GED preparation and other self-improvement programs. The state hopes to reduce recidivism through the pilot program – and to save around $1.5 million a year through the closure of the minimum-security satellite facility.

Of course, if the Community Corrections Association was serious about helping released prisoners successfully reintegrate into society, it would help them develop meaningful job skills and find employment outside the prison system, rather than use them as cheap temporary labor at OSP. ■

Nebraska County Attorney's Conviction Reversed for Theft from Pretrial Diversion Program

by David M. Reutter

THE NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT HAS reversed the theft conviction of a county prosecutor who stole funds from a pretrial diversion program he created.

When John Blake Edwards took office as the county attorney for Keith County in January 2007, he started a pretrial diversion program that allowed for dismissal of charges once a defendant had completed program requirements such as "community service or alcohol education."

The Board of County Commissioners approved the program, but required that it be self-funded. Fees and costs paid by offenders participating in the program were deposited into an account with Edwards as the only authorized signer. Between March 7, 2007 and August 13, 2008, he spent $7,257.11 from the account.

In April 2008, a county commissioner filed a complaint with the Attorney General's office alleging misuse of public funds in connection with the pretrial diversion program. No action was taken by the Attorney General, and the county board later adopted a revised diversion program that required fees and costs to be deposited with the county commissioners. It did not address the funds in the previous program.

On January 20, 2009, Edwards wrote a $3,681.09 check from the previous diversion program's account to the local trap team for junior and senior high school trapshooters. Edwards was affiliated with the trap team, and that same day the team issued him a check for $981.03 that indicated it was for "knives, shells 09 season reimb." A state audit found that Edwards was paid $7,257.11 in excess of his salary and had made $18,989.04 worth of payments not authorized by the county board from the previous diversion program's account.

He was charged on September 19, 2011 with multiple counts of theft, income tax evasion and filing a false income tax return. The income tax-related charges were dismissed, and at trial in August 2012 the jury found him not guilty of two theft charges related to $2,850 in checks written to his wife for work with the diversion program, but guilty of theft for the check to the trap team. He was sentenced to 90 days in jail, 1,200 hours of community service, nine months on house arrest, almost $3,700 in restitution and three years of probation. Edwards' law license was suspended in September 2012.

On appeal, the Supreme Court of Nebraska held on August 2, 2013 that an improper jury instruction had implicated both the presumption of innocence and the state's burden to prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. Accordingly, due to plain error regarding the jury instruction, Edwards' conviction was reversed and the case remanded for a new trial. See: State v. Edwards, 286 Neb. 404, 837 N.W.2d 81 (Neb. 2013).

Following remand, Edwards entered into a plea agreement and was sentenced in February 2014 to thirty days in jail and a $500 fine.

Seventh Circuit: Jail Social Worker Ignored Detainee's Suicide Risk

ON AUGUST 12, 2013, THE SEVENTH Circuit Court of Appeals held that a jail social worker could be held liable for ignoring a detainee's obvious risk of committing suicide.

Algerian citizen Hassiba Belbachir, 27, entered the United States as a visitor in November 2004. She overstayed her visa then flew from Chicago to England in February 2005, where she was detained by immigration authorities.

Belbachir was returned to Chicago a week later. On March 9, 2005, she was incarcerated at the McHenry County Jail in Illinois pending a deportation hearing.

A March 9, 2005 intake report did not reveal indications that Belbachir presented a significant suicide risk – in part because a "guard who filled out the intake report changed Belbachir's answer 'yes' to the question 'Are you currently extremely depressed or feeling suicidal?' to 'no,'" subsequently claiming he had made a mistake.

Five days later, Belbachir's mental state had deteriorated significantly.

"Belbachir was suicidal and suffering from a 'major depressive disorder' – a warning sign for suicide," according to the mental health progress notes of Vicki Frederick, a Licensed Clinical Social Worker employed by Centegra Health Systems, the jail's medical care provider.

Frederick's progress notes stated that Belbachir was "sobbing throughout" a March 14, 2005 interview and had said, "I'd rather die than live like this." She also admitted to drinking soap before entering the jail and reported several other alarming suicide warning signs.

Nevertheless, Frederick ignored Belbachir's obvious risk of suicide, did not alert any other staff of that risk and neither Frederick nor any other jail medical staff had any further contact with Belbachir. Three days later, she strangled herself to death with her socks.

Belbachir's estate filed a federal lawsuit against numerous county and Centegra officials, alleging that they deprived Belbachir of her life without due process of law by ignoring her risk of suicide. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants.

The Seventh Circuit reversed the judgment as to Frederick, finding that "the risk of suicide was obvious" to her, yet she "decided that Belbachir was not suicidal" and "failed to tell the guards to put her on suicide watch."

The Court of Appeals initially noted that "Although Centegra's employees are not public employees, they rightly do not deny that in performing functions that would otherwise be performed by public employees, they were acting under color of state law and therefore could be sued under section 1983."

Additionally, "Immigration authorities, who monitor the jail's treatment of its federal prisoners, rated the jail's suicide-prevention policy 'deficient' in 2002," but "rated it acceptable in both 2003 and ... 2004." Soon after Belbachir's suicide, however, "immigration authorities, in what may be an example of hindsight bias, found fault with the jail's suicide prevention policies," the appellate court wrote.

"Even if the sheriff was culpable for failing to discover and correct the deficiencies," the Seventh Circuit found the county could not be held liable because "there is no evidence that correcting them before Belbachir arrived at the jail would have prevented her suicide." The district court's order was reversed as to the judgment entered in favor of Frederick. See: Belbachir v. County of McHenry, 726 F.3d 975 (7th Cir. 2013).

Following remand, the Centegra defendants – the only defendants remaining – agreed to settle the case in May 2014 under confidential terms. ■

Mandamus Petition May Constitute Prison Conditions Litigation in Pennsylvania

by David M. Reutter

THE SUPREME COURT OF PENNSYLVANIA held on July 9, 2013 that a mandamus petition related to an underlying complaint concerning prison conditions itself constitutes prison conditions litigation within the meaning of the state's Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA), 42 Pa.C.S. § 6602(f).

SCI-Graterford prisoner Alton D. Brown is, according to the state Supreme Court, "a frequent filer of frivolous litigation in the Commonwealth and federal courts." There was no dispute that he had already run afoul of the "three-strikes-and-you're-out policy" codified in the federal and Pennsylvania PLRA statutes when he attempted to file a complaint in Montgomery County alleging civil rights violations.

His complaint was rejected three times by the Montgomery County Prothonotary for failure to provide the names and addresses of all named defendants. When Brown filed a mandamus petition to force the acceptance of his complaint, the Prothonotary moved to dismiss under the PLRA's three-strikes rule. The trial court granted the motion and the Commonwealth Court affirmed on appeal.

Brown then filed another civil action against prison officials for inadequate medical care and other conduct that he alleged violated his constitutional rights. The Prothonotary again refused to file the complaint under the three-strikes rule, Brown filed another mandamus petition and the Prothonotary moved to dismiss. The trial court granted the motion to dismiss, but the Commonwealth Court reversed on grounds that the Prothonotary had no authority to refuse to file Brown's complaint.

The Pennsylvania Supreme Court agreed with the Prothonotary that a petition for writ of mandamus may constitute prison conditions litigation and thus be subject to the PLRA's three-strikes rule if the subject matter of the underlying complaint relates to prison conditions. The Commonwealth Court's ruling was therefore reversed. See: Brown v. Levy, 73 A.3d 514 (Pa. 2013). ■

For Sale: New York Lakefront Property with Garage, Pig Farm and 736 Prison Cells

WHAT NEW YORK STATE IS DOING with some of its closed prisons is like dragging an old, unwanted couch out to the dumpster and then slapping a price tag on it.

In an effort to address state budget gaps, Governor Andrew Cuomo's administration closed seven of New York's 67 correctional facilities and put them on the real estate market in 2012. [See: PLN, June 2013, p.1].

"Instead of spending millions maintaining facilities we don't need, the governor's approach saves taxpayers millions and opens up transformative economic development and investment opportunities in communities across the state," said Howard B. Glaser, Cuomo's director of state operations.

Nearly a dozen prisons have been closed in New York in recent years thanks to lower crime rates, early release programs for nonviolent offenders and reforms in the state's strict Rockefeller drug laws. In fact, since 1999, when New York incarcerated an all-time high of almost 71,500 prisoners, the Empire State's prison population has fallen nearly 25%, leaving thousands of empty beds when Governor Cuomo announced the sale of the idle correctional facilities. New York's prison population is currently around 54,000 prisoners.

One of the vacant facilities, tucked away in the Hudson Valley, has a 16-car garage, a pig farm, hundreds of yards of lakefront property and 736 "bedrooms" with bathrooms. Another prison, off the western shore of Staten Island, offers a two-story gymnasium, a baseball field, an open-air pavilion and almost 70 acres on the waterfront. And in rural Schoharie County, a prison is for sale that includes a chapel, a carpentry shop, 20 acres of state forest land that's ideal for hunting and fishing, and a wastewater treatment plant.

"It's a building that's just sitting there," said Harold Vroman, chairman of the board of supervisors for Schoharie County, where the state closed a 100-bed minimum-security facility. "Who wants to buy a jail, you know?" he asked.

Apparently, someone does. Governor Cuomo's administration said it was reviewing a proposal for a new retail development on Staten Island to replace the Arthur Kill Correctional Facility, one of the closed prisons. Further, Camp Georgetown, a former 262-bed prison that sits on 31 acres in central New York, sold for $241,000 in May 2013. The new owners plan to convert it into a youth science camp. In the Hudson Valley, the former Mid-Orange Correctional Facility is slated to become an industrial and business park after selling for $3.1 million.

In January 2014, state officials re-issued a request for proposals for the purchase and reuse of the former Bayview Correctional Facility, a medium-security women's prison that sits on prime real estate on Manhattan's West Side. The prison closed in October 2012 after being damaged by Hurricane Sandy.

An eight-story brick building at Bayview, which was originally designed as a YMCA center, includes a large gymnasium, an art deco pool that was used for storage and a small chapel with stained-glass windows. The prison also includes a six-story annex. Cell windows on the waterfront side of the property gaze out over the Hudson River Park.

Some real estate experts said Bayview could be worth significantly more if the state would allow it to be sold for residential use or as a hotel. The site would be perfect for condos, according to developers, but the Cuomo administration has refused to accept bids for residential uses in an effort to promote job growth and ensure the desires of neighborhood residents are respected when the facility is sold.

"The state's going to leave a significant amount of money on the table by dictating the use" of the former prison, said Dan Fasulo, a managing director at Real Capital Analytics. "I think they're going to be surprised at how low the bids are."

Other states that have closed correctional facilities have converted them into properties with alternative uses. For example, the old Charles Street Jail in Boston was transformed into the Liberty Hotel in 2007; one of the hotel's bars, named Alibi, serves a $12 blueberry mojito called the "Jailbait." In Newark, New Jersey, the cells were removed from a former county jail so the building could be turned into government office space. A number of states have converted closed prisons into museums or tourist attractions. [See: PLN, Aug. 1998, p.24].

Jails are easier to convert to other uses than prisons because they're usually smaller and more centrally located. For those reasons, real estate experts say, New York might be better off just giving away its unneeded prisons.

"The only possible thing that you could use this for would be for government or military," said Fred Macchia, a commercial real estate broker in Rome, New York, where the 998-bed Oneida Correctional Facility was closed several years ago. "You couldn't make it into a hotel. You couldn't make it into an apartment complex. You're talking millions of dollars to renovate."

More New York prisons may be on the market soon, as the state announced the closure of four additional correctional facilities in July 2013.

"In response to a reduced crime rate that has shrunk our inmate population, we are continuing to right size the state's costly prison system and saving taxpayers tens of millions of dollars annually," said New York state prison Commissioner Anthony J. Annucci.

Local residents and unionized prison workers have rallied against closing the facilities, however, citing job losses and the economic impact the closures would have on the communities where they are located. The four state prisons scheduled to close by mid-2014 include Monterey Shock, Butler, Chateaugay and Mt. McGregor.

New York lawmakers have halted any further prison closures until July 2016 – after all, they wouldn't want to glut the prison real estate market. ■

News in Brief

Arizona: Former state prison guard Robert Joseph Hamm, 34, was sentenced on September 9, 2013 to 11 years in prison for having a sexual relationship with a Tucson teenager. He had previously served a year in prison after pleading guilty in 2011 to having sex with the same girl, who was then 14 years old. [See: PLN, Feb. 2012 p.50]. Eight years of the 11-year sentence were for Hamm's violation of his probation in the 2011 case. The girl's parents had alerted the police after finding a diary describing her encounters with Hamm.

Arkansas: Faulkner County jailers Seth Ferguson and Christy Jordan were fired on September 22, 2013 after officials found they had failed to check the recreation yard every 30 minutes as required by jail policy on the day three prisoners escaped. A spokesperson for the sheriff's office said the two guards had been employed by the county for almost two years. Although the prisoners were later recaptured, Ferguson and Jordan failed to notice they were missing for at least 30 minutes.

California: On October 4, 2013, Timothy Michael Russell was found dead in his cell at San Quentin State Prison, the victim of an apparent suicide. Russell was on death row for murdering two Riverside County sheriff's deputies in 1997; deputies James Lehmann, Jr. and Michael Haugen were gunned down while responding to a domestic violence call at Russell's residence. He had been on death row for 14 years.

Cambodia: On October 10, 2013, floods from the Mekong River forced the evacuation of 842 prisoners at a provincial prison in Banteay Meanchey. In some places in the prison complex the water reached levels as high as prisoners' necks, and part of the facility's outer wall collapsed. Flooding is common in Cambodia between August and October; in addition to the prisoners, around 22,000 families were evacuated.

Connecticut: Prisoner Howard Cosby, serving 19½ years at the Corrigan-Radgowski Correctional Center, enlisted the help of People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals (PETA) in his efforts to receive a vegetarian diet as required by his Buddhist faith. Prison officials, who did not consider fish to be meat, had been serving Cosby seafood three times a week. In late September 2013, PETA received a letter from Deputy Warden Giuliana Mudano stating the prison would provide a nutritionally-adequate vegetarian substitute for Cosby whenever fish appeared on the menu.

Costa Rica: Costa Rican jails are overpopulated by 40% on average, and a San José judge, Roy Murillo, ordered that 370 prisoners at San Sebastian Prison be relocated or released because "overcrowding is unlawful and contrary to human dignity." Following the September 24, 2013 ruling, the Justice Ministry began transferring prisoners to other facilities. Justice Carlos Chinchilla, president of the Penal Chamber of the Supreme Court, had publicly criticized Murillo's order; however, the Supreme Court declined to review the case.

Delaware: On September 18, 2013, Vasilios Hantzopoulos, 47, a security officer employed by the Capitol Police, turned himself in to face charges of official misconduct and sexual relations in a detention facility. He is accused of having sex with a female prisoner in a holding area of the New Castle County courthouse in August 2013. The Delaware State Police had investigated the incident, resulting in the charges.

Florida: Joseph Jenkins and Charles Walker were captured on October 19, 2013 following their mistaken release from prison due to falsified court documents. The two convicted murderers were found at a Panama City motel and rearrested without incident. They were both serving life sentences, but participated in a forgery scheme that reduced their sentences to 15 years. PLN managing editor Alex Friedmann was quoted in the Orlando Sentinel regarding the escape, saying, "As we incarcerate more people for life, we have to realize these people have nothing to lose."

Florida: On October 10, 2013, Andre Darnell Burgess, 28, was described as "suicidal" following his disciplinary suspension for "conduct unbecoming" at his job at the Florida DOC's Madison Correctional Facility. In a bizarre series of events, Burgess led troopers on a 30-mile high speed chase after his wife called police and accused him of getting drunk and then tackling and choking her. Trooper Ronald Evans discovered an intoxicated Burgess slumped over the steering wheel of his wrecked vehicle; Burgess drove away and was finally stopped after police bumped his car and it lost a rear wheel. He continued to fight while being arrested and booked, and was eventually placed in a restraint chair and spit hood. He faces numerous charges.

Illinois: Tony Henderson, 51, worked as a jail guard at the Metropolitan Correctional Center (MCC) for 16 years. On October 7, 2013, he showed no emotion when he learned he had to spend two years on the other side of the bars. Henderson was convicted of smuggling cigarettes and food into the MCC for bribes of up to $10,000. Judge Edmond Chang further ordered him to pay a $5,000 fine, saying Henderson had committed a "very serious breach of the public trust in a highly sensitive situation." Henderson declined to address the court at his sentencing.

Illinois: On October 30, 2013, Michael Hart, a Skokie police officer, was charged with aggravated battery and official misconduct, both felonies, for shoving Cassandra Feuerstein into a jail cell after becoming irate with her during the booking process. Hart's forceful shove caused Feuerstein's head and face to slam into a concrete bench, fracturing her right orbital bone, opening a deep cut on her cheek and loosening several of her teeth. Feuerstein, who had been arrested for drunk driving, is pursuing a civil suit that further claims Hart filed a false report to cover up the incident. Hart resigned from his job in November 2013 and has pleaded not guilty to the criminal charges.

Indiana: A man who escaped from the federal prison camp in Marion, Illinois in October 2000 is headed back to prison. Donald E. Bruce, 75, was deemed suspicious by an Oakland City police officer, and a background check revealed he was an escapee. When confronted, Bruce acknowledged that he had escaped, but said he wanted to spend time with family members before turning himself in. He had over nine years remaining on his initial prison sentence for a meth distribution conspiracy. He pleaded guilty to the escape charge in September 2013 and faces more prison time.

Iowa: On November 8, 2013, Chief Deputy Don Phillips of the Wapello County Sheriff's Office was among the witnesses at the second trial of former jail guard Seth Techel, accused of the shooting death of his pregnant wife, Lisa Techel, and her unborn child. Phillips testified about his interview with a former neighbor of the Techels who had complained about the sheriff's office's failure to investigate reports of vandalism on his property. Techel's defense attorneys argued that the neighbor, Brian Tate, who died in September 2012, was a more likely suspect in the case. Techel's first trial, held in March 2013, ended in a mistrial; the second trial also resulted in a mistrial and a third trial is scheduled for July 14, 2014.

Kansas: In September 2013, Harlan Hurst, a convicted burglar, was the first person featured on a Facebook page for missing parolees maintained by the Kansas Department of Corrections. Officials hope that social media will help find people who abscond while on parole. Each week the Kansas DOC will post information about one of approximately 170 parolees who are on the run; spokesman Jeremy Barclay said Facebook was a useful tool for locating parole violators.

Maryland: A deputy sheriff and a jail guard from Prince George's County were indicted on October 10, 2013 for beating a prisoner who was being processed into the county jail. At one point they forced the prisoner into a search room to continue the assault, closing the door in an attempt to conceal the beating. Deputy George Rogers and jail guard David Nkemtitah were both charged with misconduct in office; Rogers also faces a charge of second-degree assault.

Mexico: PLN has frequently reported on violence in prisons in Mexico, and on October 26, 2013, Mexican officials released information on yet another incident. Seven prisoners died in a riot at a facility in the Gulf Coast city of Altamira, about 300 miles south of Brownsville, Texas. Nine prisoners who used makeshift knives to kill the victims and injure two other prisoners were accused of starting the riot.

Michigan: On October 30, 2013, Jonathan Kermeen, a nine-year employee of the Ottawa County Jail, was suspended following accusations of inappropriate sexual contact with two female prisoners. He was fired in November 2013, then arrested and charged with two counts of second-degree criminal sexual conduct. Over the course of several months, Kermeen called the victims out of their cells and kissed and fondled them. He told investigators that he stopped the inappropriate contact after he believed someone had witnessed the incidents. Kermeen pleaded guilty to the charges and was sentenced on March 10, 2014 to 5-15 years in prison.

Missouri: Keith Conway, 49, the former mayor of Kinloch, submitted falsified pay stubs to get out of a halfway house where he was living after serving time in federal prison. He pleaded guilty and was sentenced on December 16, 2013 to six months for the fraud. In 2011, Conway had received 21 months in prison for spending city money on a $9,000 delinquent federal tax bill. He also used the stolen funds to pay personal utility bills and buy plane tickets, Caribbean cruises and train trips.

Montana: Judith A. Bird, who worked as a counselor at the Montana State Prison at Deer Lodge, was publicly reprimanded by the Board of Social Workers and Professional Counselors on November 7, 2013 for shredding prisoners' mental health requests without responding to them, and for disclosing confidential information about prisoners without their consent. Bird had been fired in March 2012 following an internal investigation conducted by the Montana DOC; she told prison officials that she had responded to the mental health requests verbally. In addition to the reprimand, she was ordered to complete remedial education classes on ethics.

Nevada: An unnamed prisoner who was receiving medical treatment at St. Mary's Regional Medical Center was shot and injured by a Washoe County sheriff's deputy on October 20, 2013. The deputy was also injured in the incident but the reason for the shooting was not disclosed. As per protocol for an officer-involved shooting, an outside agency – the Sparks Police Department in this case – will conduct an investigation.

New Jersey: Members of the New Jersey Law Enforcement Supervisors Association announced on October 26, 2013 that a "majority" of prisoners at Bayside State Prison in Maurice River Township were reportedly staging a hunger strike to protest sub-par food served by private contractor Aramark. New Jersey DOC spokesman Matthew Schuman refused to confirm the hunger strike, but said the department plans to address the prisoners' grievances. According to Aramark's website, the company provides food services at more than 500 correctional facilities.

Ohio: On October 25, 2013, Michelle Vining, a former guard at the Lucas County jail, pleaded guilty to two counts of dereliction of duty, a second-degree misdemeanor. Her plea agreement, in which she received probation, agreed to resign from her job and forfeited her sport utility vehicle, included the dismissal of felony charges for aggravated trafficking in drugs and illegal conveyance of drugs into a government facility. Also charged were former prisoners Jesse Perez and Salina Perez. Both were scheduled to appear in court, but Jesse Perez failed to appear after posting bond and a warrant was issued for his arrest.

Ohio: A prison guard has resigned after the Ohio Department of Rehabilitation and Correction found falsified logs that purported to document security checks on death row prisoner Billy Slagle, who committed suicide in his cell on August 3, 2013 – just three days before his scheduled execution. [See: PLN, March 2014, p.56]. No charges are planned against 19-year-old former guard Clay Putnam. Another unnamed guard was placed on leave while the state investigates discrepancies in an electronic log that documented how often checks were performed on Slagle prior to his suicide. Cuyahoga County prosecutor Tim McGinty had supported Slagle's request for clemency, which was rejected by the parole board and governor.

Oklahoma: On September 24, 2013, eight prisoners escaped in a transport van when guards left the keys in the vehicle while they took a sick prisoner to a hospital. Six of the prisoners stayed with the van once they stopped after driving about a mile, and one of those prisoners called 911 to report the escape. The other two,
